Museums and Galleries: Arts International

It might be easy for wealthy art enthusiasts to jet-set around the world picking up pricy pieces for their private collections. But most of us who want to check out fine art have to wait till it comes to us. For four days beginning November 11, the Cyclorama brings in works from more than 40 American and European galleries for the eighth annual Boston International Fine Art Show. A range of fine art including antiquities, 17th- to 21st-century paintings, works on paper, sculpture, fine prints and photography is on display through the weekend, but if you're looking to rub shoulders with rich upper crusties at a swanky arts affair, your best bet is opening night. The whole shebang kicks off with a black tie–optional gala on the 11th. The $100 ticket price, which supports Bank of America's Project Discovery program, includes hors d'oeuvres, all the wine you can drink and first pick of the art. 539 Tremont St., Boston (617-787-2637). www.fineartboston.com. Nov. 11, 6–9 pm, $100. Nov. 12, 1–8 pm; Nov. 13, 11 am–8 pm; Nov. 14, 11 am–5 pm. $10.

Books & Poetry: Crazy for Carlin

George Carlin began his career as a nightclub and television comic, lampooning the 1960s counterculture as Al Sleet, "the hippy-dippy weatherman" on the Ed Sullivan Show. But he soon realized that he had more in common with the era's youth than with their parents. So he grew his hair long, got booted out of a Vegas palace for obscenity and released a string of top-selling albums consisting of childhood reminiscences, drug references and crass and canny remarks. After a down period in the '80s, Carlin resurfaced with a new persona: a vitriolic ranter, hectoring his live and movie audiences with barbed wit and blunt punchlines. He also turned his talents to the printed word, penning Braindroppings, a collection of observations on language and other aspects of human interaction. Carlin comes to town November 9 to offer more social commentary as he reads from his new book, When Will Jesus Bring the Pork Chops? at the Coolidge Corner Theatre. You can probably also count on some sharp (and funny) commentary on the previous week's presidential election. 290 Harvard St., Brookline (617-566-6660). www.brooklinebooksmith.com. 6 pm. $2.

FRI./NOV. 5

CityScope: Sweet Philanthropy

It's no secret that we regard chocolate as a gift from the gods. So it doesn't take much convincing to get us to commit to a night sampling the wares of Boston's best chocolatiers, bakeries, and restaurants, including L.A. Burdick's, Godiva and Teuscher Chocolates, while sipping champagne and viewing modern art. Dana Zemack, chocolate enthusiast and star of Cambridge Community Television's The Tasty Show, plans to tickle your taste buds and stimulate your artistic vision at Chocolate...For a Change, at the Institute of Contemporary Art November 5. Only the fact that the proceeds go to the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society could further sweeten the deal. 955 Boylston St., Boston (617-266-5152). www.thetastyshow.com. 7-9 pm. $25, $30 at the door.

Movies: Cultural Celebration

Every year, the Boston Jewish Film Festival expands its schedule, bringing in more movies, speakers, actors and filmmakers for a week-and-a-half cinematic spree. The festival, now in its 16th year, features an array of international contemporary films that focus on Jewish themes. It kicks off November 3 with a comedy from Belgium, The Rashevski's Tango, at the Museum of Fine Arts. The next night, the English movie Wondrous Oblivion screens at the Coolidge Corner Theatre. In addition to the film screenings, there's a slew of panel discussions, with directors, journalists, actors and people who appear in documentaries. And on November 10, at 8 pm, the Coolidge hosts a concert with Joshua Nelson, aka "the Jewish Gospel Singer." All in all, there are about 45 films, from 16 countries, screening in six venues. For a complete schedule and to buy tickets, go to www.bjff.org. $10 most films (concert is $20 in advance, $25 day of show). (866-468-7619).

Holiday extravaganza returns to Boston

A gingerbread house contest highlights this year's Christmas Crafts Festival

We're not saying it isn't fun to wait in endless lines during the last-minute holiday rush and battle frenzied crowds determined to get this year's must-buy toy. But this year, we're going to try to stay a little ahead of the Christmas shopping curve. A good place to start is the Christmas Craft Festival, which runs from November 5–7.

For the past 18 years, artisans from all over the country have flocked to Boston's World Trade Center for this weekend-long event, and this year, more than 350 bring their wares. There's jewelry from Beth Russo and M&S, art from Mario Novak and Barbara Garrison, hundreds of unique holiday ornaments, even a partridge in a pear tree. There's also a gourmet food section where you can sample and buy products that might give your dinner that little extra boost—or make a great gift for that foodie on your list.

One highlight of this year's festival is a special gingerbread house competition, with extravagant gingerbread houses (and in some cases, towns) created by local restaurants, hotels and bakeries, including the New England Culinary Institute, 33 Restaurant, Legal Sea Foods and Jer–ne. The cakes are for sale, and proceeds benefit Community Servings, a local, home-delivered meals program dedicated to helping people suffering from AIDS and their families.

World Trade Center, Northern Ave., Boston (617-385-5000). www.christmascraftfestival.com. Nov. 5–7. Fri., 12–7 pm; Sat., 10 am–7 pm; Sun, 10 am–5 pm. $10. —Rich Levine

Grape Nuts

Sideways is tipsy fun.

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Alexander Payne's Sideways does for the approach of middle age what his About Schmidt did for the onset of old age: uses it as a springboard for bittersweet comedy and a road trip. At first, this makes the latest from the director of Citizen Ruth and Election a letdown. Those two earlier movies had a real satiric sting, especially the unjustly obscure Ruth, while Schmidt was a tamer experience. Still, even if Sideways is part rehash for Payne and his regular cowriter, Jim Taylor (who've adapted a novel by Rex Pickett this time), their movie hits such a pleasant comic groove that it's hard not to be charmed by it.

Paul Giamatti and Thomas Haden Church play two buddies who road-trip to wine country.

In Sideways, we get two characters who find age must bring emotional adjustments in life. Miles, played by Paul Giamatti (American Splendor), is a junior high English teacher who couldn't make his marriage last and can't get his novel published. His buddy Jack (Thomas Haden Church of TV's Wings) is a handsome actor whose boyish appeal is beginning to weather. With Jack about to get married, Miles decides the two southern Californians will head north to his favorite spot, California wine country, for a week-long trip where they'll have quality time together before Jack serves as Miles' best man at the wedding.

There's an amusing interplay between both Miles and Jack and the actors playing them. It's hard to say where the characters leave off and the actors begin in the hilarious little moments in which the pair goes to wineries to sample the latest vintages. Giamatti, who could be amusing reading a shopping list, gives a colorful tilt to wine connoisseur Miles' picky assessments of his tastings; in Giamatti's hands, sometimes Miles is being intentionally funny, sometimes not. Meanwhile, Jack has an endearing dumb-jock quality, and his response to Miles' "knowledgeable" wine talk is usually "tastes pretty good to me." Each man's approach to wine mirrors his approach to life, of course, with Jack blindly leaping in and Miles analyzing and analyzing (the metaphor only strains once, during a Miles speech about how his favorite grape is the fragile pinot, from which only a few growers can being out the best).

The detour-filled road trip only brings out the worst in Miles and Jack. That's what makes Sideways so funny and so bittersweet, usually at the same time. Miles' funk over learning that his book has been rejected and that his ex-wife has remarried sends him on a downer that even his anti-depressants can't fight, while Jack's insecurity over getting married makes him go after nearly everything in a skirt. These extremes of behavior play out most obviously in the men's relationship to two women they start hanging out with: Maya (Virginia Madsen), a waitress Miles has a crush on and very gingerly pursues, and Stephanie (Sandra Oh), a winery employee with whom Jack practically moves in, without telling her he's getting married in days.

What makes Sideways even funnier is the way the pals themselves bring out the worst in each other at times. Miles' skittishness makes Jack want to act in the opposite way, and Jack's irresponsibility only makes Miles even more cautious. The two pals have a relationship that's somewhere between the sitcom broadness of The Odd Couple and the bruised masculinity of Robert Altman's great California Split (the bluesy 1970s buddy movie that never came out on VHS but is now finally on DVD).

Sideways lays in that fertile midground between studio releases and independent movies—it's not precious, as an indie film might be, and Payne has made some interesting choices that you don't often get at the multiplex. First, there's the casting of Church. He's not as down on the acting food chain as Jack, who never made it beyond soap operas, but it helps the role that Church has never really become a star—the last time he had a role this big was when he took over Brendan Fraser's part in the video-only George of the Jungle 2. The same goes for casting Madsen as world-weary divorcee Maya. She had a string of splashy roles in the 1980s, in such films as Dune and The Hot Spot, but hasn't had a movie part this meaty in a decade. Like Maya, she's been around the block, and it helps her character.

With Giamatti front and center—along with Philip Seymour Hoffman, he's movies' most convincing and appealing everyman nowadays—Sideways is refreshingly down-to-earth. Its comedy and its emotions are life-sized, its laughs generous and compassionate. This movie will age just fine. iB

Sideways ★★★

Directed by Alexander Payne. Written by Payne and Jim Taylor. With Paul Giamatti, Thomas Haden Church, Virginia Madsen and Sandra Oh. Rated R. At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.

Donnie Darko: The Director's Cut ★★

If it ain't broke, don't fix it. Writer-director Richard Kelly's brilliant Donnie Darko returns—not in the version that struck an emotional chord in many, despite being barely marketed in 2001, but in Donnie Darko: The Director's Cut, a new version running 20 minutes longer. Except this isn't a true "director's cut"; this 133-minute version never existed before now. If you haven't seen Donnie Darko, the original version is a better introduction; if you have, you've probably seen the added stuff already. Most of the "restored" footage comes from deleted scenes on the Donnie Darko DVD. Meanwhile, Kelly has also gone back and changed some of the songs to what he originally wanted, but couldn't afford in the budget. But wait a minute. Kelly originally wanted U2's "MLK" at the climax, not Michael Andrews and Gary Jules, unforgettably haunting version of Tears for Fears' "Mad World," which became a surprise hit. So why didn't he replace that, too? Kelly should have remained satisfied with the other happy accidents in his movie, too. (Midnight shows at Coolidge Corner, Nov. 5, 6, 12 and 13.)

Dr. Strangelove ★★★★

Peter Sellers (times three), Slim Pickens, Sterling Hayden, George C. Scott and the most wicked satire of the bogus arms race and the Cold War. 'Nuff said. Back for a 40th-anniversary rerelease, Stanley Kubrick's dynamo is still as funny as hell and still scarily relevant. (At Kendall Square.)

Friday Night Lights ★★

As an "inspirational sports movie," this tale of Texas high school football at least mixes in some unusual touches with the usual clichés. Its cinematography has a semidocumentary, fly-on-the-wall style most of the time, and you have to respect any football movie that uses the Stooges "I Wanna Be Your Dog" during game footage. But it still has nauseating Bible Belt pseudoreligion, the tired device of play-by-play commentary over game action and overinflated "big" moments, and it sometimes feels like director Peter Berg's audition reel to land car-commercial gigs. Surprisingly, the lead character—the pressured coach played by Billy Bob Thornton—is very vague; he's either a loud hard-ass or a caring father figure, rarely anything in between. Fortunately the footballers, including those played by Lucas Black and Derek Luke, are more defined. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Garden State ★★½

The first film by actor-director Zach Braff (TV's Scrubs) has its moments of daffy humor, as Braff plays a struggling L.A. actor who returns to his New Jersey hometown for the first time in nine years. It recaptures the mixed emotions of such a visit, especially of seeing old high school friends, but it treads on very familiar territory. It feels like it wants to be a version of The Graduate directed by Wes Anderson (Rushmore), and it struggles to find any voice of its own. Plus, the story of a guy returning to his hometown who develops a quick bond with a Natalie Portman character has already been done, in 1996's Beautiful Girls. Braff and Portman have a pleasing chemistry, and Braff is to be commended for trying to make something quirky and personal. But it's hard not to feel this movie is redundant. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square and suburbs.)

I [Heart] Huckabees ★★★

Writer-director David O. Russell's world is a chaotic one in which he amusingly forces characters to face up to their place in it, sometimes willingly, sometimes not. In Russell's latest film, troubled activist Albert (Jason Schwartzman) is somewhat willing, but he's not prepared to be pulled into the rabbit hole by the existential detectives (Lily Tomlin, Dustin Hoffman) he hires to find meaning in his life. The duo drags Albert into the lives of his nemesis (Jude Law)—a junior executive trying to turn Albert's environmental group into a PR-friendly front for his chainstore—and a fellow client (Mark Wahlberg) obsessed with petroleum consumption. The movie ricochets around like a pinball, sometimes distractingly so, but most about every direction it heads in is hilarious. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Harvard Square and suburbs.)

Lightning in a Bottle ★★★

Filmed on the enormous stage of Radio City Music Hall, the musicians in this blues concert movie sometimes seem as if they're in different states, rather than actually interacting with each other, and director Antoine Fuqua films half the movie in isolating close-ups. But there are enough thrilling performances from Ruth Brown, Mavis Staples

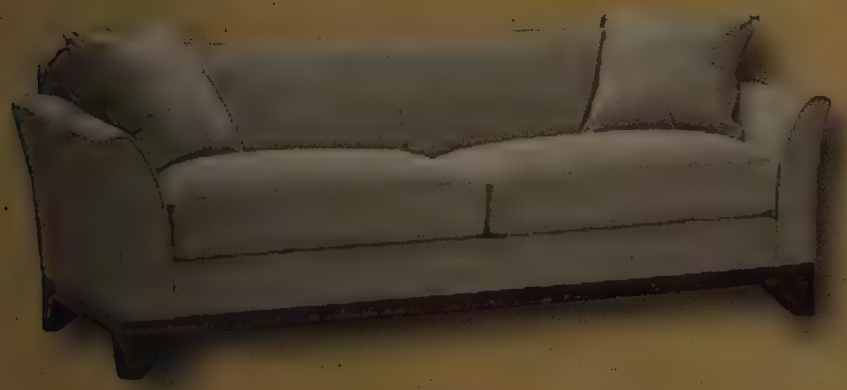
Peter Sellers in one of his three roles in Stanley Kubrick's Dr. Strangelove, which has been rereleased for its 40th anniversary

B.B. King, Solomon Burke, Odetta, Shemekia Copeland, Bonnie Raitt and (surprise of surprises) Natalie Cole—generally covering other people's songs—to overcome that. And I'm willing to accept Steven Tyler and Joe Perry's questionable presence here as a trade-off for the blessed absence of default white wannabe bluesman Eric Clapton. (At Coolidge Corner.)

The Machinist ★★½
Former Bostonian Brad Anderson's latest isn't as gripping as it might have been, but it's an intriguing, Twilight Zone–style slab of genre story. Christian Bale plays the frazzled hero, an insomniac who's losing his mind and, literally, his body. Bale dropped a ton of weight for the part, but turns his meaty role into more than a freak. As the story progresses, we learn there are concrete reasons why the guy has been checking out from reality, and the movie's grimy visuals perfectly reflect his state of mind. The Machinist is more in the line of Anderson's creepy Session 9 than his arthouse hit Next Stop Wonderland, and that's fine with me. (At Harvard Square.)

Shall We Dance? ★★
It's hard to think of an American remake of a foreign film that's as faithful to the original as this tale of a businessman whose drab life turns upbeat when he starts secretly taking ballroom-dancing lessons. But while the 1996 Japanese original was a charmer that won you over, the American remake gets the slick Hollywood treatment, and all that that cliché suggests. Stars Richard Gere, Susan Sarandon and Jennifer Lopez don't always have the everyday quality required of their characters; the American gregariousness smothers the Japanese reserve that was a hallmark of the original; and the remake awkwardly overreaches at times, especially in the over-the-top climax set to the cringe-worthy Peter Gabriel song "Book of Love." (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Shaun of the Dead ★★★
Director and cowriter Edgar Wright's zombie comedy isn't just a horror spoof à la Scream, it's a movie about funny characters. Wright knows how to set up gags and put them across, and horror has nothing to do with his characters' amusing habits, like saying "What's that supposed to mean?" to glaringly obvious accusations. Like the zombies that slowly surround him and his circle of friends, the title character of this very funny English comedy springs back to life over the course of the movie. Shaun (co-writer Simon Pegg) is an affable bloke whose lack of ambition finds him stuck at a job requiring a name tag, and whose lack of romantic inspiration finds him dumped by girlfriend Liz (Kate Ashfield). But when zombies walk the streets of London, Shaun leads the survivors (to the pub, of course). Shots are fired, flesh is ripped, friends are mourned and, somewhere along the way, Liz is perhaps convinced that Shaun has left his feckless ways behind him. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square and suburbs.)



Tarnation ★★★½
In a year of too many remakes, sequels and "same old, same old" movies, Jonathan Caouette's distinctive documentary stands out. Culled from 20 years of the home movies he's shot since he was a boy, it tells the unforgettable, tragedy-laced story of his family and of his relationship with his mother Renee, who was subjected to numerous sessions of questionable electro-shock therapy as a teenager. It's a cycle of madness that Caouette's grandparents foisted on his mom, and that he has continued to try to fight off. Almost as remarkable as the family history is the way Caouette tells the personal story, in a fast-moving collage of home movies punctuated by deadpan onscreen text. Few movies this year have been as compellingly involving. (At Kendall Square.)

Team America: World Police ★★★½
Trey Parker and Matt Stone's return to the big screen is much, much funnier than its so-so trailer. Some have called the South Park creators' puppet-animated comedy politically impotent, since it makes fun of both the right and the left, but it's much more a pop-culture satire than a political satire. Its story of a team of terrorist-fighting Americans is most of all a priceless spoof of ego-thumping Hollywood action movies. The title characters carelessly destroy other countries' national treasures (the Eiffel Tower, the Sphinx, etc.) on the way to protecting American security because, as in most pumped-up Hollywood action pictures, other countries just aren't as important as we are (the parody of the clichéd disrespect that action movies show Arabs and other ethnicities is a hoot). Of course, the similarity between the swaggering American self-image parodied here and our government's behavior is in the eye of the beholder. Meanwhile, Korean dictator Kim Jong Il is the WMD-distributing bad guy, a cross between Elmer Fudd and Blofeld, while Team America's domestic nemeses are Hollywood lefties including Alec Baldwin, Tim Robbins and Michael Moore. Sure, it's childish to make fun of celebrities who've spoken out against the war in Iraq, but it's childish to have a puppet puking for a minute and a half, yet that's also the funniest movie scene all year. And, as in the South Park movie, Trey Parker's song parodies just can't be beat. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Undertow ★½
Writer-director David Gordon Green's Bible Belt drama includes a Cain-and-Abel fraternal conflict that spills over to one of the brother's sons. But despite such grand themes, the backwoods story is supremely dull. Dermot Mulroney is the Georgia recluse whose ex-con brother (Josh Lucas) returns with vengeance in mind, and whose sons (Jamie Bell, Devon Alan) get caught in the crossfire. Green's quirky rhythms and his use of mostly nonprofessional actors gave last year's All the Real Girls a realistic touch, but there's little that's quirky or interesting this time around. (At Copley Place and Harvard Square.)

movies, as we meet his title character, played by solid Imelda Staunton. She's an industrious, generous housekeeper in 1950s England who works hard, never complains and also happens to "help young girls out" by performing abortions. She's simply a fascinating person to watch, until halfway through the movie. That's when she gets arrested after one of the girls nearly dies, and the legal procedures and family complications she suffers turn the story utterly predictable. Instead of being involving, the action just becomes a long-winded exercise in contrasting Vera's treatment to that of a young rich woman (Sally Hawkins) who, in a too-short subplot, gets an abortion through doctors who'll skirt the law for a price Vera's lower-class patients could never pay. (At Harvard Square and West Newton.)

What the Bleep Do We Know? ★★

It's different, all right, but that's not always a good thing in this indie, new-agey blend of documentary and drama. The documentary has some generally interesting scientific theorizing about the way the body perceives the world and about the effect of emotion on cells. But the interesting stuff is married to goofy animation and, even worse and even goofier, dramatic sequences starring Marlee Matlin as a two-timed photographer who undergoes an attitude adjustment. These scenes are as clunky as an airline safety video. (At Copley Place, Harvard Square and suburbs.)

Campfire Girl

Australia's Kasey Chambers brings her back-country music to Boston.

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

I'm looking at the ocean and the sun is shining," Kasey Chambers says from the balcony of her coastal Australian home, an hour north of Sydney. "It's a beautiful day."

Chambers, who crosses that ocean for a U.S. tour that hits the Somerville Theatre November 12, is indeed enjoying a beautiful outlook these days. She's a new mother whose son inspired some of the songs on her new country-pop album, Wayward Angel, her third multi-platinum release at home, having already spent seven weeks atop the Australian charts. And the scene she describes from her balcony is, literally and figuratively, miles from where she spent her childhood.

Kasey Chambers has gone from the touring the Australian outback to topping the charts.

The 28-year-old singer-songwriter grew up in the Australian outback, where her parents, Bill and Diane Chambers, hunted foxes on the Nullarbor Plain and imparted a love for country music to Kasey and her brother Nash around nightly campfires.

"Music was a big part of our lives, but it was more of a form of entertainment back then," she says. "My dad used to get out the guitar and play, and we'd all sing along, and it was just like listening to music, because we didn't have TV or radio, and weren't in touch with any civilization.

"It was sort of like listening to my dad's tapes," says Chambers, whose father shared his love for Merle Haggard, Johnny Cash, Gram Parsons and Emmylou Harris with the two children. "I was really only exposed to that music for the first 10 years of my life. I didn't know that there was pop music."

The family formed the Dead Ringer Band, touring Australia in a Toyota Land Cruiser through the early '90s and making a name for themselves in country music circles. When her parents separated and the band broke up, Chambers went solo with 1999's The Captain, retaining her brother as producer and father as guitarist, an arrangement that remains in place today.

"It's funny how my life has changed so much in the past 10 years," says Chambers, whose mother also remains aboard the family ship, handling merchandise. "The only similarity is that we still travel so much. I think that side of it comes from living on the Nullarbor Plain, because we lived in a different place every night. We lived in our car.

"Obviously, it went from the most remote lifestyle ever, when you didn't even see people for weeks and weeks, to playing for people every night," she says. "[The change] was really strange, but I love it now. I think I would go absolutely mental if I had to not be around people now."

Nonetheless, that stark shift in lifestyle appears to have influenced songs on Wayward Angel that address fame and privacy issues. "This is not Hollywood, there is no camera in my room," Chambers sings in "Hollywood," while noting in "For Sale" that, "You can buy my life on radio, and order me by mail, but not everything about me is for sale."

"There are definitely moments when I just enjoy being mum instead of being Kasey Chambers," she says. "It's not that bad. I get to sell a lot of albums here in Australia, as many as the big pop acts, but I don't have the paparazzi following me around. I get asked more for autographs and I'm recognized on the street. But I like being around people."

Chambers co-wrote two songs on the new CD with Australian television host and video director Cori Hopper, the father of her toddler, Talon. "He's not really a songwriter, but he seems to have a bit of a knack for it," she says of Hopper. "I don't co-write very well with other people. I find it hard to sit in a room and pull my heart out, but I guess with him being my partner, I found it a little easier to do that."

Luckily, Chambers discovered her own knack for writing and singing songs as a teenager. "My dad took me when I was about 12 years old to see Roseanne Cash when she toured here," she says. "On the show was Lucinda Williams and I had never heard of her before, and I remember that as a turning point. I had never seen women like that singing their own songs before."

Now the sweet-voiced Aussie upstart has earned the respect of such country-rooted heroes as Williams (with whom she last played Boston) and Emmylou Harris. "When I was really little, all I wanted to do was be a fox hunter like my mom," she says, "and I'm so glad I didn't." iB

Kasey Chambers plays the Somerville Theatre Nov. 12.

INTRODUCING THE NEW BOSE® WAVE® MUSIC SYSTEM.

PERFORMANCE everyone can recognize.

SIMPLICITY everyone can appreciate.

ELEGANCE that speaks for itself.

ITS HERITAGE Popular Science called the original Bose Wave® radio "a sonic marvel." The Chicago Tribune said its sound was "superb." And Forbes ASAP magazine placed it on their "All-Time A-List" of technology breakthroughs that have changed the world. Now, the award-winning predecessor has been engineered to a new standard of performance, simplicity, and elegance.

ITS NEW PERFORMANCE

- Reproduces one-half octave lower musical notes.
- Produces even greater instrument clarity and definition.
- Plays the newer MP3 CDs as well as conventional CDs. (MP3 CDs can contain as many as ten standard CDs on just one disc.)
- It may well become the primary music system in your home.

ITS NEW SIMPLICITY

- No buttons!
- It is completely and conveniently controlled by a small, elegant remote control.

FREE shipping with your order.

ITS NEW ELEGANCE

- The original model has been repeatedly praised for its distinctive design. The new model has carried this design to an unprecedented level with the absence of all buttons.
- A thin, slot-loaded CD player replaces the previous top door mechanism.

IT COMES WITH A 30-DAY EXCITEMENT GUARANTEE. During this risk-free trial period please compare, side by side, the sound of your new Bose Wave® music system to that of larger and more expensive sound systems owned by you or your friends. You will appreciate our request when you make this comparison.

rockie horoscope

SCORPIO OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Assume you're being lied to, especially if you've got a birthday coming up. Nothing malicious intended, but a deception just the same. Pray it's simply a surprise party in the works, something that won't embarrass you or an esteemed colleague. You're also likely to become frustrated if you challenge any authority figure—client, mentor or executive chef. And while you rarely submit to someone else's agenda, for the sake of maintaining the peace, try to be a bit more amenable. Smile.

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Do you habitually rely on your Jupiter ruler to protect and serve your assorted causes? Then, by all means, keep it up. Because generous Jupiter is joined by beneficial Venus this week, your chances of obtaining something you want or being the chosen one increase appreciably. Their meeting in likable, civilized Libra suggests that the outside world will take more notice of you. Since that combination is often a justification for "too much of a good thing," try to behave in a socially acceptable manner. No horsing around.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

Election Day results could affect you more than you know. While your pragmatic, paternal Saturn ruler is uncharacteristically receptive to mercurial Mercury's arguments and fact-finding forays, you might ask questions you normally wouldn't. Especially of a group you're allied with, colleagues at work and partners in crime. Or, you can just as easily have faith that the open-hearted, open-handed merger of Jupiter and Venus will assuage any fears and doubts. Cockeyed optimism?

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

Can you put a happy face on every value, every asset you share with a loved one? How effective a spin can you come up with? Postelection results are informed by two contradictory planetary alignments. First there's the intense, power-crazed Scorpio sun testing your faith, your willingness to believe when it squares impressionable Neptune in your sign. Then there's the (overly?) optimistic merger of megabucks Jupiter and acquisitive Venus (ruler of the NYSE) in your house of other people's money wishing you good luck.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

Another pitch for bucks from an organization you've been lending financial support to? That's one possible result from the sun's square to your idealistic Neptune ruler. Another possibility is accepting a challenge to advance your talent by using other people's resources. And while your inherent romanticism might be questioned, your confidence gets an enormous boost from the fortuitous collaboration of Venus and Jupiter, the gods who bestow both the manna and the money. Six of one, half a dozen of the other.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Let significant others call the shots since the tremendous amount of good fortune heading their way can also be a boon to you. The twice-blessed merger of loving Venus and protective Jupiter in your Libra house of partnership is a rare (once or twice every 12–13 years) event. Rams born in the first half of the sign meet Lady Luck this week; those born in mid April see her next Labor Day. They should plan accordingly. Everyone could try to be more diplomatic. Mend fences and don't make any more demands.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

A cause for celebration, another for misgivings. Two separate, but hardly equal, energies influence your week. First, the good news: Your pleasure-seeking Venus ruler joins jolly Jupiter in your house of romance and recreation, making for memorable fun and fooling around. Now the bad: The sun in your Scorpio marriage house may be mesmerized by Neptune's veil of illusion. Is a close relationship starting to reek? However, if your mate has a glamorous gig, the deception might not have an adverse effect on anyone but you.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

Spread the word: No matter what your reaction to the election results may be, you could feel compelled to voice your opinion in any way and to anybody within reach. Once your Mercury ruler makes the leap out of secretive Scorpio into Sagittarius on the 4th, broadcasting your version of the truth becomes more important than ever. Don't worry that you'll overstate your position and get in trouble—the two "benefics," Venus and Jupiter in air-sign-friendly Libra, have your back. You might even be rewarded.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Home is where the heart is. Trite but never more true than when affectionate Venus and expansive Jupiter get together every decade or so at your Libra base of operations. They offer a renewed attachment to family and cultural roots, a greater desire to make your house look its best, no matter what the cost. Just watch out for unexpected weirdness, a sense that a scam is in the works. Impressionable and often delusional Neptune in your house of shared resources may entertain an entirely different vision.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

You're still riding the money train thanks to the fortuitous merger of Venus and Jupiter, the cosmic benefactors, in most Lions' house of assets and acquisitions. Rake it in while you can, kitties, because nothing this good lasts forever. Leos born in July receive the benefits being doled out in other ways: greater admiration by siblings and peers, a more prominent presence among the neighbors, a more luxurious set of wheels. That is, after you've paid the repair bill. Don't be careless or gullible, either.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

Insisting on learning the truth, not the same as gathering the facts, may be your next cause célèbre. After your Mercury ruler enters Sagittarius on the 4th, you're apt to fixate on a subject that'll carry you into next year. No kidding. Mercury in late Sag turns retrograde at the end of November and doesn't cross over to Capricorn until January 9. That can turn into one long, strange trip. Meanwhile, enjoy the goodies you gather courtesy of the happy coupling this week of Venus and Jupiter in your house of valuables.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Double happiness. You might grow overly confident or take all those compliments for granted, but that's only because prosperous, protective Jupiter and your Venus ruler are meeting, for the first time in 12 years, in your sign. Milk this moment for all its worth and, if you're a gambler, it could be worth a lot. Nothing is quite as lucky as having the two good guys of the solar system combine their fortunes. September Librans have the best odds; those born in mid October cash in next summer.

RECENT CORRESPONDENCE FOLLOWS.

To Her Royal Highness

I didn't come to the Gloucester restaurant where you're known to help out on occasion to meet or to talk with you. It so happens my friend from Gloucester suggested it, and mentioned that you might be working there if we went. Forgive me if I intruded on your "community service" but for some foolish reason, I thought you might like to know that I was incensed over your firing. My first apparent mistake was respectfully addressing you by your last name. When you responded with "Yeah?" that should've been my first clue that you were not going to be receptive. I told you I was glad that despite the flak you took, you stuck to your guns. Your trite and condescending "Thank you" was about as sincere as a Hallmark card.

Now, it would be a different story had you been an actual patron of the restaurant, and I had intruded on your meal to offer my support. But even then, a simple "I appreciate that" would have been the civilized thing to say. But you choose to volunteer your time at the establishment, and if you weren't a celebrity, I don't know any restaurant that would find such attitude an admirable trait in an employee. The waitresses at Durgin Park back in the day had better manners than you displayed the evening of October 25. By the way, I work for an ad agency that does PR for major studios, and I've met my share of temperamental actors, directors and screenwriters. If this is how you behave when you're not performing, God only knows what it must be like working with you. If I were the actors on your short-lived sitcom, I'd be grateful it got canceled. Don't worry, however. I won't be going back to that restaurant any time soon, so you can continue to pretend you're "keeping it real" by joining the working class while in between acting and stand-up gigs. And here's one last piece of advice: If you really want to blend in with the rest of the waitstaff, ditch the sunglasses and signature 'do—they're a dead giveaway.

—Unimpressed

Hot Elevator Guy

I saw you in my elevator in my West Side apartment. It was the first week of October. You were visiting someone in my building. You had to get buzzed in—I hope it was not a girlfriend. It was 11 pm, my friend and I just got home from the grocery store and we filled the elevator with our bags. You got off at the 4th floor. We exchanged glances and smiles. I thought you were so hot, I really wanted to talk to you, but was not sure how to go about it. I was hoping that I would run into you again, but I believe it is highly unlikely. If you happen to be reading this and remember me, contact me.

—Karfro@aol.com

Looking for Rob

I met you the night of October 9 upstairs at Vox on Boylston Street when I set a cup of water on your table. You live in the South End and work for Gillette. You were with a friend named Jeff, who is 46 and said he worked in the corporate cafeteria business. You are around 6'1" or 6'2", 39 years old, dark hair, clean cut, great smile and very nice (even though you're a Yankees fan). I really enjoyed talking to you and I was going to go back to your table and get your phone number or give you mine, but you were gone. I know this isn't the greatest information, but if anyone reads this and knows Rob or can help me find him, please let me know. Thank you!

—Amanda, AEO2626@aol.com

Beacon Hill Babies?

Instead of expecting others to deal with your noise, you should instead be considerate in close quarters—no matter what the hour. For your information, music emissions above 70 decibels are in violation of the local noise ordinance. And, citywide, if any two parties feel any other party is a nuisance, the complaint overrides the decibel threshold. If the complaining party heard your music in their home, it was indeed too loud. No one needs to move or close windows to accommodate you, you arrogant butthead. As for your silly expectation that people who stay at home on Fridays are uncool or miserable, grow up. I have a vivid social life and stay home most Friday nights because they are a hassle, amateur. If you can't stay home by yourself on any night, you are insecure and uncomfortable in your own skin. On one count, you are right: The personal approach works best, and the complainers were just as immature in their behaviors as you were in your expectations. Despite your professional, post-college status, you are still clearly a kid.

Cutie Shopping

It was mid afternoon, October 11 at Neiman Marcus. I caught your eye as I was coming down the escalator into the men's department. You were wearing a brown suede jacket with a reddish shirt and a had a sparkly smile. I have dark curly hair and was sporting a blue sweater. When our eyes connected I smiled and gave you my best "Queen Mary Wave." I was running to put money in the meter and by the time I came back you were gone—would you like to grab a cocktail and see if those sparks were real? Drop me a line.

Claire's Beauty

You: long, straight black hair, black T-shirt, jeans, tattoos and beautiful face. Me: longish, red hair, T-shirt, jeans and glasses. I stopped in Claire's Boutique in Downtown Crossing on the afternoon of October 16 to ask you a good place to get a Halloween costume. You were so pretty putting up displays that I noticed you outside the window from the sidewalk and just had to talk to you, but I couldn't screw up the courage to ask you if you were single. If you are interested in getting to know me, send me an e-mail.

Squirrel B Gon

You are the beautiful blond-haired girl with the fabulous smile who was sitting on Boston Common October 20 at 1:45 pm, reading what looked like a movie script. I am the guy, age 28 with brown hair, who was sitting a few benches down from you. We shared a few nice glances and your smile made my heart skip a beat. Then you laughed, smiled and tossed your hair as you watched me fight off the vicious squirrels that attacked me as I ate my lunch. After I successfully fended off the squirrels and finished my lunch I thought about what it would be like to kiss you and tried find the courage to introduce myself. Then all of a sudden the squirrels swarmed you and we shared another magical glance. I tried to offer you my skillful squirrel-defeating assistance, but you just smiled and walked away. I had hoped that you would have come over and sat next to me, but you continued off toward the Park Street T station and flashed back to me one of the most amazing smiles I have ever seen. Right then and there I knew I had to see you again. I hope I will see you back at the benches where I promise I will always protect you from the attacking squirrels. If I don't see you in the park, please send me an e-mail.

To the Brewers Fan in Southie

At times in the morning while we walk our dogs, our routes cross, and for a few blocks we talk: about the Sox, work and the park we take our four-legged friends to. I always mean to but forget to ask if you would want to meet up for coffee around work (Fair Trade coffee of course). It's been a while since I've seen you, so I thought I might leave our meeting up to more than serendipity!

WHAT MAKES A GREAT BARTENDER?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-card routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartender issue.

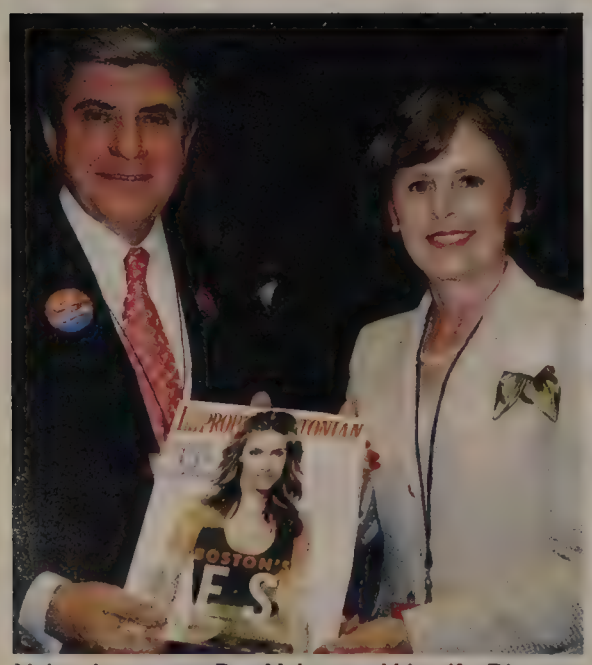
GRATUITOUS YANKEE-BASHING EDITION!!!

UNLIKE THE REST OF YOUR FRIENDS, WE WANT TO SEE THE PHOTOS FROM YOUR NEXT TRIP

Where do you take us? Send us a picture of you or a friend, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed Improper Sightings.



Keith Neal overheard several sharks discussing how they'd like to bite Derek Jeter, but they don't like the taste of conceit, at the Great Barrier Reef off Australia.

Nebraska senator Ben Nelson and his wife, Diane, remind us of our favorite Emerald Nuts ad during the ALCS: eavesdropping Nebraskans! Mmmmm.

Joe Colletta and Alex Gill hiked to the summit of Mount Adams in New Hampshire. Behind them is Tuckerman Ravine, where George Steinbrenner plans to hide Brian Cashman's body once the snow is deep enough.

Ioannis Miaoulis and Greg MacGillivray say they went to Greece to film an IMAX movie, but we think Babe Ruth's in that ecto-backpack.

Holiday Gift Guide

The gift of results this season, results for your business.

Holiday Gift Guide Issue Dates	Advertising Deadlines
November 17	November 3
December 1	November 17
December 15	December 1

Let a photo tell your story! In The Improper Bostonian's November and December Holiday Gift Guide issues, you'll be able to showcase your gift items in a full-color advertising section designed especially for the holiday season, running consecutively in our three pre-holiday issues. We will showcase your photographed item in a format with six items to a page. Each item will be numbered, and we'll list your business name, address, phone number, Web site, item name and price. The layout will be simple and elegant, enhancing the image of your product or service.

The Improper Bostonian reaches more than 384,300 Bostonians every two weeks. They predominantly live in the heart of the city, in Boston's most upscale neighborhoods: Back Bay, Beacon Hill, South End and North End. They wield tremendous spending power. Our readers won't just buy gifts for friends, family members and co-workers, but for themselves as well. They are your strong repeat customers. No other advertising vehicle targets this audience as effectively as The Improper Bostonian.

LAST SCENE HERE

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

WATCH YOUR TOES...

"Someone once asked, 'Why are you such a name-dropper?' I said, 'You know, when I was at Buckingham Palace, the queen asked me the same thing.'"

That joke was even funnier when Archbishop Desmond Tutu told it while introducing actor Danny Glover, the evening's honoree, at an awards dinner held by South Africa Partners in the ballroom of the Back Bay Sheraton.

In addition to a Nobel Prize winner and a movie star, there were numerous other names worth dropping, like presidential adviser Eli Segal (the evening's other honoree); event co-chair and Antiguan glamazon Colette Phillips; lieutenant governor Kerry Healey; Harvard School of Public Health dean Howard Koh; his colleague, Dr. Deborah Prothrow-Stith, with her husband, former U.S. ambassador to Tanzania Charles; blue-blooded do-gooders Bill and Jane Saltonstall; sizzling State House hottie Jodi Charles; banking bigwigs Bernie and Carol Fulp; gorgeous Ghanaian Obenewa Amponsah; esteemed journalist Sari Boy; and American Repertory Theater head honcho Bob Woodruff (a friend of Glover's from the days when they were starting out in San Francisco).

In addition to drinks and dinner (at tables decorated with South Africa's national flower, the protea), there was music by the Milton Academy Jazz Combo and speeches that were actually worth listening to. Eventually, the evening turned into one big birthday party for the bishop, who danced around on stage while everyone sang along to Stevie Wonder's "Happy Birthday."

Summing up the evening, one starry-eyed guest put it this way: "I got two kisses from Tutu and a hug from Glover." Now that's something worth bragging about.

WELL, BOOZE DOES MAKE EVERYONE LOOK BETTER...

The fabulousness was almost blinding at FashionPlates 2004, a benefit for Community Servings held at Filene's and featuring a few of our favorite things—namely cocktails, little nibbly treats, a fashion show and shopping.

White-hot designer Michael Kors flew in from New York to debut his new ready-to-wear collection, and among the crowd clustered around the runway and having a case of the vapors over the clothing, the models, or both, were foxy Fox reporter Glenn Jones; absurdly attractive executive coach Rich Merritt; mystery scribbler Robert B. Parker and the über-groovy Joan; fashion designer Elaine Perlov; impossibly hot couple Brian Lighty and Andy Bigelow; Newbury Street hair deities William George, Marc Harris and Jeremy Dellaria; tie designer Tony Corey and his delightful sidekick, Barry Pett; the personification of hospitality, Cedric Adams; intimidatingly chic interior decorator Eileen Patterson; handsome scamp Richard Gordon; real estate titan Jerry Finegold, and two women who both loved a rabbit fur vest so much they bought it off a mannequin's back and agreed to joint custody.

Meanwhile, another guest raved about the spiced nuts on the bar, to which a friend wisely replied, "I'll leave that one alone," and someone else observed, "I just love being able to walk up to the cosmetics counter and order a vodka martini."

At Sweet Harvest, top row: Rick DiCecca and Caterina Bandini; Joe Quattrocchi. Middle row: Ken Dietz; Gita and Mark Costa. Bottom: Grace Regan and J.B. and Tiffany Dowd.

A ROOMFUL OF SUGAR MAKES THE PARTY GUESTS GO "WOW!"

If you're of the opinion that Sweet Tarts, Tootsie Rolls, Swedish Fish and Red Hots deserve a food group of their own and belong at the top of the USDA's food pyramid, you might've lapsed into a sugar-induced coma at Sweet Harvest, a cocktail party to benefit the Greater Boston Food Bank, held at the Parkman House on Beacon Hill.

Spotted among the natty, good-looking crowd were such junior movers and shakers as Channel 7 anchorbabe Caterina Bandini; makeup maestro Rick DiCecca; puckish restaurateur Joe Quattrocchi; newlyweds Tiffany and J.B. Dowd; philanthropic fun couple Gita and Mark Costa; the incomparable Emily Webster; South End force of nature Molly Dunne; swanlike socialite Grace Regan; ubiquitous groover Dan Karp, and so on and so forth.

While trays of tasty hors d'oeuvres (including caviar on blinis) circulated throughout the room and the bartenders valiantly tried to keep up with requests, guests took their chances with a $20 balloon raffle, but the evening's dominant and unavoidable theme was candy. Enormous, artfully arranged jars containing everything a sweet tooth could crave were prominently displayed on every available flat surface.

"It's a good thing my kids aren't here," said one parent. "I'd need a spatula to pee 'em off the ceiling." IB

Who better than catcher Jason Varitek, the player who's routinely called the soul of the team and unofficial team captain, to grace the cover of the IMPROPER's first-ever Red Sox tribute issue? In the midst of the Sox' post-Series bliss-out, and his own contract negotiations, Varitek kindly agreed to pose for an issue you'll want to read and stow away for posterity.

Our Sox stories include Ezra Dyer's take on the real meaning of the Series victory, Chris Collins' observations from the press box, and interviews with fans, sportscasters and celebs—plus a closer look at what it's like to be Jason Varitek at this moment in baseball history.

Championship revelry aside, it's time to start thinking about practical stuff like holiday shopping, so we've stocked this issue with tools and inspiration to get you started—five pages of stylish gifts, and a look at what's on local boutiques' shelves this season. Even if you're not much of a shopper, you're probably in a good mood for the task this year.

SUIT ALORS!

Come on, now! Your latest issue (Nov. 3) had a great opportunity to showcase some of Boston's classically suited hunks, and there you go again…putting some 20-year-old in a $3,000 suit! Not only does he look foolish (page 31 specifically), but in the four-page spread, there wasn't one shot showing the pants! Probably because they needed some alterations, right? Let's focus on reality here—even if you have to go to Zegna to see who's really buying their beautiful suits.

DOWN WITH FRIVOLOUS REVERIE

Good Lord! John Kerry, a distinguished Bostonian, is up for the presidency in the most seethingly fought national election, and all your staff can muse on is the Red Sox comeback and a freckly, seashell-adorned damsel on your cover (Nov. 3 issue). Now I firmly believe that your publication is just a showcase for trivialities, for the mindless page-riffling of white, heterosexual, fashion-crazy, attention-deficit-stricken T commuters. I should just tear out the Books/Poetry event section and throw the remainder of your magazine in the recycling bin. Wake up! End your frivolous reverie, before the IMPROPER becomes insignificant!

—YUSUF NASRULLAH

UP WITH FRIVOLOUS REVERIE

When baseball has World Series champions that perform in dramatic style and continually refer to themselves as idiots, haven't we found some true improper Bostonians? They have class, style and a healthy irreverence. Some call it magic, some a dream, I call it simply the Best. How about an entire issue devoted to them? It could be entitled Boston's Best, Volume 86, Issue 86, and all kinds of new Best or IMPROPER categories are possible: Best come-from-behind win, best clutch hitter/pitcher, best hairstyle? Thanks for a great magazine.

BEN THERE, DONE THAT

I really like your new recurring feature: the Ben Mezrich letters section. Ben's letter (Oct. 20) and Brian Ethan Brandt's response (Nov. 3) were both enjoyable. I do hope you will continue this feature, and publish letters by or about Ben Mezrich in every issue. Consider this my contribution.

BIG SMILE

On Nov. 9, the Leather District got another dose of international flavor when chef/owner Ian Just opened the doors to his new Italian restaurant, Sorriso, just a couple of doors down from his bistro Les Zygomates. Although the restaurants are practically side by side, there are some marked differences. Whereas Les Zygomates serves up fancy French fare in elegant surroundings, with live music and a romantic vibe, Sorriso (the name is Italian for "smile") specializes in less expensive rustic Italian cuisine and has a hip, neighborhood feel.

Just says, "In a way it's an extension of what we're trying to do with Les Zyg—bring people to a neighborhood they don't know about yet. This neighborhood is very unique, filled with artists and upwardly mobile professionals." Just also hopes Sorriso will attract more of the neighbors themselves and hopes his relatively low prices will do the trick.

Chef John Paine

Salmon with caponata olive vinaigrette

Local interiors guru Peter Niemitz designed Sorriso's space, occupied most recently by Epiphany and before that Oskar's. The restaurant seats about 150, with a few tables near the entrance and bar area, which was already bustling on Sorriso's opening night, and more in a larger dining room near the back. Exposed-brick walls are adorned with murals of Italian scenes, and the tables are spaced widely, giving the room an open feel. A little pizza bar at the back lets you sit face to face with chefs tossing pizza dough.

Just has enlisted John Paine (from Lumiere, Casablanca and Caprice) as executive chef at Sorriso, and the two have created a menu of seasonal pastas and pizzas, tapas-like dishes and entrées. Appetizers, including white bean and roasted-garlic puree ($5), arancini ($6) and fried calamari with gremolata($8), are easily shared, as are the seafood-heavy antipasto options, like steamed mussels with Sardinian couscous ($8). Other smaller dishes from the carne category include Italian cured meats and oxtail and egg ravioli (both $9).

For a secondi course, we especially liked the terrazzo steak with roasted brussels sprouts and patate fritte ($21), and Just recommends the seasonal baked gnocchi ($14)—a potato gnocchi al Forno, with mushroom and fontina ragu. He's also excited about showing off Sorriso's pizzas, which you can see chefs making at the big brick oven in the back of the restaurant. "I'm such a stickler for thin-crusted pizza," Just laughs. "It shouldn't be droopy and you shouldn't need to use two hands. It wasn't perfect on the first try, but they nailed it." 107 South St., Boston (617-259-1560). www.sorrisoboston.com.

LASH OUT

False eyelashes tend to conjure up visions of '60s go-go girls, but lately subtle versions of the falsies are making a comeback. As more women discover the eye-opening benefits of faux lashes, makeup companies are finding new ways to create more-natural looking lashes—Madonna and J. Lo are among the celebrities who've been spotted sporting mink tips. My favorites are made by the Japanese beauty line Shu Uemura. They look completely natural and deliver big results. Shu Uemura offers the following tips for applying them:

Step 1: Curl your own lashes.
Step 2: Apply mascara.
Step 3: Apply lash adhesive to the back of the false lashes.
Step 4: Using tweezers, line up the fake lashes with your own lash line and press in gently.
Step 5: Let dry.

A SPECTACULAR ARRIVAL

Since 1933, the Rockettes have been kicking off the holiday season with their legendary Christmas Spectacular at New York's Radio City Music Hall. The show took to the road in 1994, and after 10 years the Rockettes and the Christmas Spectacular make their Boston debut at the Wang Theatre. Veteran Rockette Stephanie Lang, who will be front and center at all 60 productions, took a few minutes to chat with us about high-stepping it on stage before the show's opening, December 2.

IB: Is being a professional dancer anything like they portray it in A Chorus Line*?*

SL: Actually it's pretty close. You constantly go to auditions thinking "I hope I get it." Sometimes they keep having you come back, and it can go on for a couple of weeks until they decide who they want. It's nerve-racking, but if you choose the career, that's your job. You have to develop a thick skin for it.

IB: Have you ever seen a football player miss a field goal and think "I could've hit that?'

SL: Well, yeah. Actually, when I was in high school, I was on the powderpuff team and I was the kicker. We were a lot closer than a normal field goal line, but still I was able to make it over.

IB: There are animals on stage for the Christmas Spectacular. Have you ever had a Siegfried and Roy–like encounter?

SL: No. We have three camels in the show, and each camel has a handler that they know, so they're not going to give someone who's meeting the camel for the first time a leash to lead them around. And the other animals are pretty docile. I mean, it's a donkey, who is on the older side, and then sheep. So the most that would happen is somebody might get their toe stepped on.

IB: What are the criteria for being a Rockette?

SL: You have to be at least 18. Five-six-and-a-half to five-eleven is the height. And then proficient in tap, jazz and ballet.

IB: How long do you have to train before you're allowed to perform as a Rockette?

SL: If you're a brand-new Rockette, they do what's called rockette boot camp where you learn how to stand on a line and link up when we have our arms on each others backs. And it's actually a secret: You're not allowed to touch. We do what's called feeling the fabric, so it looks like we're touching, but we're actually standing on our own. We have three weeks of rehearsal before we're on stage and it's eight hours a day six days a week, and then we open and that's it. So on top of being a good dancer you have to be really quick on picking up the choreography.

IB: Is there an aging out-clause in your contract?

SL: There isn't. You can never be too old. As long as you have the stamina and can do the kicks and everything, you are welcomed in the line

IB: What do the guys say when you tell them you're a Rockette?

SL: We walk around in costume when we go to the cities, so everybody's just like "Oh my god. Look at the legs."

WHAT A DEAL

Getting Carded... We thought trading cards were as stale as the stick of gum they come with, but SR Media's Chef Cards are a new take on an old concept. Available in packs of 20 (for $4.95) beginning December 1, Chef Cards are marketed as collectible trading cards, and while they don't provide the chefs' height and weight stats, they are emblazoned with your favorite local chef's mug. You don't have to wait for the cards to appreciate; they're immediately redeemable for rewards like free dessert or 10 percent off your check at participating restaurants including 75 Chestnut, Tremont 647, Temple Bar, Bia Bistro and Pho Republique. www.chefcards.com.

Jae Walking... Jae Chung, proprietor of popular Jae's restaurant in the South End and Brookline, is opening another location of his pan-Asian eatery in early November, at 711 Boylston Street. Diners can expect Jae's classic menu—a combination of Japanese, Korean and American cuisine—as well as a sushi bar, an extensive sake selection and Chung's signature salt-water aquariums at the new Back Bay locale. 711 Boylston St., Boston (617-236-1777).

Steaktown, USA... With new steakhouses popping up in Boston about as a frequently as Jude Law movies at the cinema, we weren't surprised to hear a little rustling from one of the Hub's established meat markets. During the second week in October, Fleming's Steak House and Wine Bar expanded its Stuart Street location with a new 40-person dining room. The Vineyard Room is equipped with a window view plus A/V and DSL hook-ups and serves prix-fixe meals (starting at $59). It'll host power lunchers during the week but opens up for public wining and dining on the weekends. 217 Stuart St., Boston (617-292-0808).

A Decade of Delicious... Although greatest-hits projects don't always live up to the hype, when we heard "greatest hits" and "Jody Adams" in the same sentence, there was no cause for worry. The head chef and owner of Rialto announced this fall that she'll celebrate the eatery's 10th anniversary with a year-long series of seasonal menus highlighting her favorite dishes of the last 10 years. The first fall menu features items like grilled bluefish, seared venison and BBQ pork tenderloin, but you'd better act quickly before other fall favorites take their place. 1 Bennett St., Cambridge (617-661-5050). www.rialto-restaurant.com.

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

The Next Best Thing... When we heard the former owners of the Financial District sports bar/dance club the Place were opening a new venture called the Greatest Bar, one word came to mind: cocky. But judging from the lines that have formed outside the Friend Street watering hole since its opening last month, they weren't far off the mark. The enormous projection screen over the main bar—and TVs throughout the gigantic four-story space—made it a hot spot during the World Series with the twentysomething set, and its popularity shows no signs of relenting. 262 Friend St., Boston (617-367-0544).

I Spa... Boston's beauty biz is booming, as evidenced by the arrival of two new spas, both of which hail from New York City's tony Park Avenue.

The MedSpa at 30 Newbury opened this past summer and offers the usual assortment of laser hair removal, Botox, collagen, chemical peels, facials, laser vascular therapy and microdermabrasion. Meanwhile, überspa Exhale, which also has New York outlets on Madison Avenue, Central Park South and in the Hamptons, is prepping for its December opening at the Heritage on the Garden. The 13,000-square-foot space, formerly occupied by Candela, will feature 15 treatment rooms, a mani/pedi bar, tea bar, organic café and "quiet" room, as well as two 1,200 square-foot yoga and Core Fusion studios. The MedSpa, 30 Newbury St., 4th floor, Boston (617-266-6330). Exhale, 28 Arlington St., Boston (617-532-7000).

A Tangled Web... There's something to be said for acting as a liaison between America's darkest secrets and the public eye—it can land you a book deal. Jamaica Plain's Gabriel Jeffrey has been posting anonymous confessions on his Web site, www.grouphug.us, since October 2003. Entries range from harmless (One time I wanted a chicken parm sub so badly that I cried) to strange (I hate artists, but I wish I could paint) to too twisted to print here (sex, drugs, bestiality, you name it), and are completely untraceable. Over the past year, millions have posted their naughtiest, queasiest thoughts for the world to see. For your reading pleasure, Jeffrey compiled the best entries (264 pages worth) into one book, Stoned, Naked and Looking in My Neighbor's Window, scheduled to hit shelves this month.

Reality to the Rescue... With baseball on hiatus for the next couple of months and the NHL on the back burner, the gang over at NESN had some significant airtime to fill this fall. Enter reality TV. On November 3, NESN premiered Roughing It, an unscripted outdoor adventure series. Host Charlie Moore and a group of guests, like former Pats QB Steve Grogan and local comedians Kevin Knox and Frank Santorelli, partake in everything from white-water rafting and hang gliding to dog sledding. Sounds adventurous. But may we suggest upping the stakes a bit with, say, a Sox vs. Patriots steel cage battle royal? Check www.nesn.com for a schedule.

Contain Your Excitement... Boston's tight living quarters require the average city dweller to turn storage into an art form. Fortunately, organization emporium the Container Store has creative storage options to spare. The Dallas-based retail giant, which just opened its 33rd store, in Chestnut Hill, has enough shelving and storage options to keep the editors of Real Simple happy for months. From closet to kitchen to laundry room, it's all about numbers: The 27,000-square-foot retail space stocks more than 10,000 items, including 103 types of hangers, 38 tie rack models, 47 styles of laundry baskets, 56 trash can varieties and 14 different paper towel holders. 27 Boylston St., Chestnut Hill (617-566-7400).—E.H., J.I. & Rich Levine

ROGER AND ME

You haven't known fear until you've been to a strip club with your girlfriend's dad.

Let's consider the relationship a guy has with his girlfriend's dad. At worst, it can be purely adversarial—he hates you; you're afraid of him. I can sympathize with the plight of the girlfriend's dad, because he, being a guy, knows that men are scumballs. And you're considered a scumball until you prove otherwise by, say, rescuing his daughter from a burning building or marrying her.

That's not to say you can't be friends with Dad of Girlfriend, but even those scenarios involve a measure of fear. Take, for example, one of my high-school friends, who last summer lived in an apartment above his girlfriend's dad's garage. My buddy was friends with the Dad of Girlfriend, Sully, but he was friends with him in the careful way you might be friends with a volatile bear who likes to hang out in your backyard and occasionally eat one of the neighbors.

Physically, Sully made Paul Teutul Sr. on American Chopper look like Woody Allen, and he didn't like to take no for an answer. One night when I was visiting, we partied with Sully until 2 am and then went to bed. Around 3 am, Sully bounded up the stairs, turned on the lights, threw beers at us and yelled, "Drink, you pussies!" After satisfying himself that we were awake and imbibing, Sully proceeded to grill my friend on why, after dating his little girl for four years, a ring had still not been produced. This is the toughest Dad of Girlfriend ever, I thought as I sipped my wake-up Budweiser.

My girlfriend's dad, Roger, is also a Harley owner, but that's thankfully the only thing he has in common with Sully. Roger has never awakened me in the middle of the night to demand I drink beer and/or marry his daughter, although he is good at exuding the vibe that he could kill you with his bare hands if he so chose (which might actually be a trait that all Girlfriend's Dads begin developing naturally from the moment they hear "It's a girl!").

Which brings me to my girlfriend's brother's wedding in North Carolina over Labor Day. The night before the rehearsal dinner, the menfolk decided to celebrate the pending nuptials with a trip to Solid Gold, an establishment that is neither a music store nor a jeweler. It was easy to spot the three most well-behaved guys in the strip club: me, Roger and the groom. We were all keeping one another in check, because none of us wanted to look like a dirtbag in front of the others. It was a veritable cold war of strip-club propriety.

It was also completely uncharted territory for hanging out with a girlfriend's dad. Under normal circumstances, you're not supposed to admit to a girl's father that you've ever even been to a strip club. If asked, you'd reply, "Strip club? Is that some sort of steak sandwich?" Now here I was, one chair away from my girlfriend's dad, while between us sat a decidedly topless woman with a name like Buxxxie who was cheerfully explaining the pros and cons of nipple piercing. I responded to this information like I was possessed by Eugene Levy. "Oh, so they go through right there? My, that's sure something, isn't it? That's healthy, miss. You're very comfortable with your sexuality and that's just great. Waitress!" When Buxxxie started propositioning Roger and me for lap dances, I sent her over to the groom, who in turn passed her off on another member of our party like some kind of topless hot potato. None of us were gonna go there.

I've never been as self-aware as I was that night at Solid Gold. I was trying to strike a careful balance between being one of the guys and not being too much of one of the guys. Lap dances were obviously out of the question, and even your standard leering seemed like a no-no. I was like a kid with ADD, never paying attention to any one thing for more than a few seconds. I consumed beers at a furious rate.

> WHEN BUXXXIE STARTED OFFERING LAP DANCES, I SENT HER TO THE GROOM, WHO PASSED HER OFF AGAIN LIKE SOME KIND OF TOPLESS HOT POTATO

Eventually I got a little more comfortable with the situation, as evidenced by the fact that at one point I blurted, "I feel like a perverted high school gym teacher!" Never mind the circumstances. It just came out. I couldn't help it. Roger laughed. Phew.

In the end, I'd recommend going to a strip club with your girlfriend's dad if you get the chance. After all, if you can't look like a prince next to the guys at a strip joint, then even a diamond ring might not save you from a solid gold entry in the scumbag file.

Soroff ON

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Film and television producer Michael Williams is a co-creator of Queer Eye for the Straight Guy and last year won an Academy Award for producing Errol Morris' documentary feature film The Fog of War. Born in Andover, Williams studied communications at Boston University's School of Film. His numerous credits include the movies Mermaids, Little Man Tate, Housesitter, Hoffa, The Good Son, Oleanna and Celtic Pride, as well as such television projects as The MatchMaker, The Wedding, Truman and Spenser: For Hire. In 1994, he co-founded Scout Productions, an independent film and television production company. His other projects with director Morris have included the award-winning feature documentary Mr. Death and both seasons of the critically acclaimed TV series Errol Morris' First Person for Bravo and the Independent Film Channel. In addition to executive-producing Queer Eye for the Straight Guy and the teen bedroom makeover show Knock First, Williams is the executive producer of the programs Face Time and 24w/. His feature film Home Before Dark, meanwhile, won the Grand Prize at the Hamptons International Film Festival. He lives in West Roxbury with his partner, David Collins.

Jonathan Soroff: I auditioned for Queer Eye for the Straight Guy. Give me one good reason why you didn't cast me.

Michael Williams: You weren't gay enough.

JS: I'd beg to differ. So since Queer Eye went on the air and you won the Oscar, your life must've gone a bit insane. Biggest adjustment you've had to make?

MW: I used to buy all my clothes at Banana Republic. Now I've been thrown into the world of John Varvatos, or going to Barneys on the weekend.

JS: Which sort of begs the rudest question of all: Exactly how rich has Queer Eye made you?

MW: Well, we're certainly doing better than before.

JS: Biggest indulgence since you hit it big? New cars? Major appliances?

MW: An Italian sofa. NBC gave us a flat-screen TV. I guess one of the biggest indulgences was on one of the rare occasions David and I happened to both be here in Boston, and we wanted to go out for dinner. We said, "Let's go to the South End." We were heading for B&G Oysters, which I love, but they were really crowded, so we went to Hamersley's instead. A year and a half ago, I would've said, "Hamersley's is way too expensive. We can't afford it. That's only for special occasions." So going someplace really nice without thinking about it.

JS: When was the moment you said, "I've really arrived"?

MW: Well, this year, we went to the Emmys, the Grammys and the Oscars.

> THE BEST PART OF [QUEER EYE] IS THE HUNDREDS OF LETTERS WE GET FROM GUYS SAYING WE'VE HELPED SOMEONE ACCEPT THEIR HOMOSEXUALITY, OR OPENED THEIR EYES IN SOME WAY

That was pretty heady. At the Emmys, people were coming up to us; they knew who we were. Then we went to the Grammys and walked the red carpet and had great seats, and got to watch the best concert in the world and see every star close up. And then we got to the Oscars. David and I arrived in a car, and we got out, and people were screaming. It was crazy. I'm thinking, "Wow, they recognize us!" But then we turned around and saw that Elijah Wood and the Hobbits were right behind us.

JS: Queer Eye is now an official part of pop culture. Does that make you feel immortal?

MW: Well, not me personally, but what we've created is immortal. I always knew in my heart that this was going to be a big hit. I had no idea of the phenomenon, but I knew it would be successful. And the best part of that is the hundreds of letters we get from guys saying we've helped someone to accept their homosexuality, or opened their eyes in some way. That, to me, more than ratings or money or anything, is what I'm most proud of.

JS: If Andy Warhol was right that everyone gets 15 minutes of fame, where's the clock for Carson & company?

MW: I don't know. I remember last year, in September, someone yelled at one of the guys, "You've got about a minute left!" We'd like to be around for a while. Will we be around for 10 years, like Friends? No. But three or four? Maybe. We want to keep it fresh, which is why we're traveling, and having some guest stars come in. If people are still liking it and watching, we'll try to keep it interesting for them, instead of fading out quickly.

JS: First thought when you learned you were nominated for an Academy Award?

MW: What should I wear?

JS: Where do you keep your Oscar?

MW: For the first month or two I took it from my home to the office every day, but for the past few months it's sorta been in a linen closet next to the liquor bottles.

JS: Celebrity most in need of a makeover?

MW: I don't want to be catty.

JS: C'mon! How about Donald Trump? He could use some help with that bad rug...

MW: You know, we had dinner at Mayor Bloomberg's house, and the Donald was there, and the Fab Five were sorta looking at this bright orange hair thing and making comments. But, hey, he's the Donald.

JS: Best way to get onto Queer Eye*?*

MW: It's not so much trying as having a great story as to why you want to make those changes: I'm going to see my old girlfriend. I have a class reunion. I want to propose. I'm meeting my in-laws. It's not just "I want a room full of free furniture." Something has to be at stake that makes us root for the guy.

JS: What's the most valuable stuff the guys on the show get?

MW: Well, a room full of furniture costs a lot of money.

JS: What's your response to people saying you perpetuate stereotypes about gay men?

MW: That's crazy. We do have style and flair. Not everyone does, which is why we're doing a special called Queer Eye for the Gay Guy. Sure, some gay men don't have that sensibility, but a lot do.

JS: How about planning Ellen DeGeneres' wedding, or hosting a holiday special from Martha Stewart's jail cell—Martha and the Fab Five Caroling on Cellblock Nine?

MW: Great idea. Actually, her people approached us about having her on the show, and we loved the idea, and the network loved the idea. The advertisers didn't.

JS: How about serious spin-off ideas: Lipstick Lesbianism for the Butch Chick? Relax Your Crack for the Uptight Investment Banker?

MW: [Laughs.] Yeah, we've gotten just about every idea under the sun, and we've been parodied by just about everyone.

JS: Last question, and I'm begging you: Could you please do something about Rosie O'Donnell? It's getting scary.

MW: Sure, we'll try and fix that 'do. IB

'TEK SECTOR

BY EZRA DYER

The 2004 Red Sox clubhouse got a lot of attention for its freewheeling ways. But amongst the pranksters, space cases and follicles gone wild, there stood Jason Varitek, the man who ran the game from behind the plate, calmed nervy pitchers and, when necessary, provided a 230-pound incentive for hit batsmen to go quietly to first base without making a detour to assault the battery. He was the crew-cut in a room full of shags—literally—and one of the central reasons that last season's wild ups and downs culminated in a championship.

Along the way, Varitek was tested as much as anyone, particularly in the epic Games 3, 4 and 5 of the ALCS, which lasted a combined 15 hours. Was the man who was crouching behind the plate for nearly all that time completely gassed by the end? "It was probably tougher in Game 3 because our pitching got slaughtered," says Varitek.

It's hard to believe that in the space of barely two weeks, Varitek went from suffering the ultimate front-row view of the Yankees' Game 3 onslaught to gracing the cover of Time magazine in a delirious embrace with closer Keith Foulke, captured moments after winning the World Series. Winning the championship brought "pure joy," says Varitek. "Thankfulness. It's a lifelong dream. It's the pinnacle of your occupation. I can't really explain it more than that."

Along the way, he had to corral Tim Wakefield's knuckleball in ALCS Game 5 ("I missed a few balls. It's stressful. But if you never miss any, you're probably not catching many either.") He watched Yankees nemesis Alex Rodriguez get his best comeuppance since Varitek himself stuffed his mitt in A-Rod's face July 24. He switched his pregame headphone music from Eminem's "Sing for the Moment" to Rascal Flatts' "Mayberry." Now that the demons have been slain, does this mean the pressure will be lessened for subsequent Red Sox teams?

"No," Varitek quickly replies. "These fans are going to be as hungry as they ever were, but hopefully they'll be able to lose some of their anxieties. They always expected a World Series, but they expected to get their hearts broken. This will bring more joy to spectating, without that back-of-the-mind hurt that Red Sox fans have had to live with from generation to generation."

As this issue of the IMPROPER goes to press, it remains to be seen whether Varitek himself will be part of the team's future. When I call the catcher at his home in Shawnee, Ga., the first thing he says is, "This is really bizarre, but your voice... You sound exactly like our general manager." As we near the end of the interview, I put forth a scenario that both Varitek and Red Sox Nation would like to see unfold: "Since I sound just like Theo, see how this sounds: 'Jason, we'd like to offer you a five-year contract...'"

"Out*standing*," he replies.

Let's hope that whatever the final terms, Varitek gets to say that same thing to the real Theo. IB

SEASON IN THE sun

THE RED SOX MAY HAVE DEFEATED ST. LOUIS IN THE WORLD SERIES, BUT THOSE FOUR GAMES WERE REALLY ABOUT ALTERING THE POWER BALANCE WITH NEW YORK FOREVER.

BY EZRA DYER

For a little while this October, it was looking like Vegas got burned. Red Sox fans everywhere had groaned at the start of the season when oddsmakers proclaimed the Sox favorites to win the World Series, and after ALCS Game 3 against the Yankees it appeared the wiseguys had underestimated the team's capacity to disappoint. Sure, they looked solid on paper, but there were intangibles not to be dismissed. What if Manny dropped a crucial fly ball during the pennant race because he was daydreaming about unicorns? What if Pedro threw out his back picking up his 28-inch friend, Nelson De La Rosa? What if third base coach Dale Sveum had to drive the team bus for some reason, and he got in a huge accident by running a red light? Most importantly, what about the fact that the Red Sox clubhouse carried the emotional mass of an 86-year championship drought? Mass creates its own gravity, and in the Red Sox's case, bad luck historically came crashing down from the ether in critical situations, like a Russian satellite landing on your Sunday picnic. Inept fielding. Inept managing. Unlikely clutch heroes on the other team. If the Red Sox were a country song, they'd be a sad ballad about a woman who done left and took the truck, the dog and the last tin of tobacco with her.

"Next year we'll do it," we'd say each fall. But in past seasons, that mantra recalled the scene in Liar Liar when Jim Carrey's son says, "My teacher tells me beauty is on the inside," and Carrey replies, "That's just something ugly people say." For 86 seasons, "This is the year" was just something Red Sox fans said.

But beginning with Kevin Millar's ninth-inning walk against Mariano Rivera in Game 4 against the Yankees, the smoldering ember of hope that this might really be the year caught a faint draft and sent up a thin wisp of smoke. Either that or the smoke was coming off pinch runner Dave Roberts' cleats as he stole second base. The Yankees had him under closer watch than Winona Ryder in Recordtown, but Roberts, his back leg cocked at almost a 90-degree angle, took off so fast that by the time he got to second, crash test dummies everywhere were wincing at the sheer G-forces involved. Then came Bill Mueller's single—the game was tied and I knew that I'd be staying up late because the Sox can never, ever, simply come back and win in the bottom of the ninth. I assumed they'd flirt with victory for a couple of innings before sending me to bed at 1 am with the sour taste of a season-ending extra-innings loss—nay, sweep—in my mouth. But this time, David Ortiz ended the game with a walk-off home run in the 12th. This Is the Year was still alive. Vegas was not yet proven wrong.

Ezra and pals at the Rack wave the Sox on to victory against the Cards in Game 4.

A crowd celebrates the Red Sox World Series victory outside the 109 Brookline bar on Brookline Avenue.

But even if you watched that game, how many Red Sox fans honestly thought the Sox had a chance to do anything but save face? I watched it mostly by myself. There were no parties for Game 4. My attitude was that if there were only going to be one more Red Sox game this year, then damn if I wasn't gonna watch it. But the whole "We believe" mantra? At that point I believed that Hideki Matsui might become the first player to hit .982 in the postseason. I believed that Randy Johnson had put on a Jon Leiber costume for Halloween and was now pitching for the Yankees. I believed Gary Sheffield had developed a superhuman ability to read pitches by observing reflections off his mustache. I believed Denis Leary's pregame prognostication that the Yankees would beat the Red Sox, and the Cardinals would beat the Yankees (taking grim satisfaction in that second part).

Then came Game 4. Then Game 5. Then Game 6—each time, the next day's TV schedule amended with the clause "if necessary."

Well, those games were necessary, in so many ways. Theo's moves validated. Curt Schilling redeemed. Terry Francona's lineup stubbornness rewarded by Mark Bellhorn and Johnny Damon. The Yankees mortalized forever. The American League Championship Series had more riding on it than a trip to the World Series. The 2004 ALCS was about the future of hope in Boston. Every year, Fort Myers is filled with optimism, but how would we have gotten our hopes up next spring if this team couldn't win? If you can't win with Schilling and Martinez on the mound, Keith Foulke in the bullpen, a lineup anchored by two .300 hitters with 40-plus home runs, and a bench so deep that your backup catcher has a .525 slugging percentage, what the hell are you going to do to win next time? Where's the hole to fill? What move could Theo pull in the offseason that would make us say, "Now we're all set"? According to the pattern of history, we'd sign Carlos Beltran and get [illegible] cited for a day or two before Steinbrenner countered with Barr[illegible] plus, for good measure, Bo Jackson, who would come out [illegible] and hit 45 home runs, since that's what washed-up veterans do for the Yankees.

"Where Fox played up the history between the Sox and Yankees during the ALCS, during the World Series they were reduced to showing graphics like the one pointing out that 1918 was sure a long time ago."

But for once, after seven games and so much stress that my liver is the new Green Monster, the Sox advanced to the World Series.

This wasn't last year's team. Last year, Manny got in trouble for coming to the plate to Styles' "I Get High." This year we had Keith Foulke running out of the bullpen to Danzig's "Mother," which features the cheery lyrics,

"If you wanna find hell with me
I can show you what it's like Till you're bleeding!"

And you thought Mariano Rivera's "Enter Sandman" routine was menacing.

Last year we had Grady Little pulling the strings, or rather, not pulling the strings. This year we had Terry Francona, who totally rocked (back and forth, especially during tense games). Last year we had an imperative, Cowboy Up; this year we had a rhetorical question, Why Not Us? Last year Derek Lowe was an unpredictable head case who could either give up six runs in the first inning or throw a shutout. This year...OK, so not everything was different.

When the World Series started, the games had a feeling of denouement, an aftershock to the earth-rendering quake of the ALCS. There was just nothing sinister about the Cardinals. Where Fox played up the history between the Sox and Yankees during the ALCS, during the World Series they were reduced to showing graphics like the one pointing out that 1918 was sure a long time ago. Granted, the Sox had a couple of long-ago World Series losses at the hands of the Cardinals, but the 2004 World Series was still about New York, not getting revenge for 1946 and 1967. It was about ensuring that Yankees fans have to make new signs next year, come up with new chants, bow down to the champs. We wanted to beat the Cardinals, sure, but we wanted to beat them so New Yorkers would get no leeway to claim the American League pennant had been stolen by a fluke streak of luck.

As the Sox neared victory in the final game of the World Series, my friend Andy pontificated on the meaning of the triumph: "New York is a miserable place," he said. "People live there only because they have to. Boston's the better city—where would you rather live? But New Yorkers were always able to throw the Yankees in our faces. Now we not only have the better city, we've got the better team too."

Who'd have thought a Red Sox fan would ever sound that confident, and before the last game of the World Series had even ended, no less? Being on the winning side of the scoreboard is a pretty sweet feeling. I think I could get used to it. If I ever miss rooting for an epically maligned loser, I can always move to Chicago iB

CURSING OUT THE BABE

BY RICH LEVINE

In the past, bad luck and questionable decisions had been the calling cards of the Red Sox. But in 2004, everything came up Boston

October 2, 1978
One-game playoff for American League Eastern Division title, vs. Yankees
Light-hitting Yankees shortstop Bucky Dent (who had hit .120 in the previous 20 games) comes up in the 8th inning and hits a seemingly weak fly ball to left field. The ball gets a little boost from the wind (and possibly the Babe) and somehow falls over the Green Monster for a three-run homer. Yankees win game 5–4, go on to sweep the Los Angeles Dodgers in the World Series.

October 15, 1946
World Series Game 7, vs. Cardinals
Cardinals outfielder Enos Slaughter goes from first to home on a base hit to left field after normally slick-fielding shortstop Johnny Pesky hesitates on his relay throw home. Cardinals win game and series by a 4–3 margin.

October 17, 1999
ALCS Game 4, vs. Yankees
On a crucial play, umpire Tim Tschida, with his head up his ass, fails to see that Yankee second baseman Chuck Knoblauch misses a tag on Sox baserunner Jose Offerman by about 19.18 feet. Sox lose game and series.

October 25, 1986
World Series Game 6, vs. Mets
Red Sox first baseman Bill Buckner commits his first and only error of the World Series, but his inability to field the routine ground ball enables the Mets to complete an improbable comeback and gives Sox bashers 18 more years to gloat, after the Sox lose the game and, two days later, the series.

October 16, 2003
ALCS Game 7, vs. Yankees
With a three-run lead heading into the 8th inning, Sox manager Grady Little decides to leave a worn-down Pedro Martinez in the game. Yankees come back, Sox lose series and Little joins the likes of Buckner and Harry Frazee as guys who you can bet won't have their own bobblehead day at Fenway.

October 19, 2004
ALCS Game 6, vs. Yankees
Relatively light-hitting Red Sox second baseman Mark Bellhorn (who had hit .129 in the 2004 playoffs to that point) comes up in the 4th inning and hits an opposite-field line drive that barely clears the left field wall of Yankee Stadium, giving Boston a 4–0 lead. Sox win game 4–2, go on to win ALCS and World Series.

October 26, 2004
World Series Game 3, vs. Cardinals
Normally sick-fielding left fielder Manny Ramirez and first baseman David Ortiz each throw out would-be run scorers, including pitcher Jeff Suppan, who unlike Slaughter was unable to go even from third to home. Sox win game and series.

October 19, 2004
ALCS Game 6, vs. Yankees
On a crucial play, umpire Randy Marsh calls Alex Rodriguez safe after he karate chops the ball out of Bronson Arroyo's glove. Umpires convene, reverse call and possibly the curse. Sox win game and series.

October 23–24, 2004
World Series Games 1 and 2, vs. Cardinals
Red Sox first baseman Kevin Millar commits his first and only error of the World Series—followed by seven more by his teammates over the next two games—enabling the Cardinals to do absolutely nothing. The eight errors in two games set a World Series record, but the Sox win both games and the series.

October 26, 2004
World Series Game 3, vs. Cardinals
With a four-run lead heading into the 8th inning, Sox manager Terry Francona decides to take a worn-down Pedro Martinez out of the game. Mike Timlin and Keith Foulke get the job done, Sox win the game and series, and Francona joins the likes of Bill Belichick and Red Auerbach as guys who you can bet won't ever have to pay for another drink or meal in Boston.

Jim Lonborg

Question #1: What was your highlight of the 2004 season?

Bill James, baseball guru/Sox adviser: Foulke to Mientkiewicz, 1–3.

Bob Neumeier, sports radio host: Forty-five minutes after Game 4, when all the fans who made the trip to St. Louis gathered around the Sox dugout cheering "Thank You, Red Sox."

Joseph Abboud, fashion designer: Coming back from destruction and climbing Mount Everest to beat the Yankees. The baseball gods have had enough of George Steinbrenner.

Dan Shaughnessy, Boston Globe columnist: Still being alive when it ended, I suppose. Sitting at the keyboard and writing a Page One story about an 86-year quest ending.

Johnny Pesky, Red Sox legend: I'd say winning the wild card because without that, none of this would have possible.

Bill Simmons, ESPN.com columnist/Boston Sports Guy: Attending Games 4 and 5 of the Yankees series at Fenway, the two greatest baseball games I've ever seen, and they happened within 20 hours of each other. My runner-up was the day Cesar Crespo was sent down to the minors.

Mayor Thomas Menino: The way the Sox played as a unit. These guys exemplified teamwork.

Bill Lee, former Red Sox pitcher: Watching the Sox beat the Yankees from a bar in Maui. All four games were just thrilling. It was so exciting to see them come back from the dead, like Lazarus.

Edward Cossette, www.bambinoscurse.com: You can't top the simple toss to first from Foulke that gave the club their first World Series in 86 years.

Dane Cook, comedian: Schilling, pitching hurt in the ALCS. What he did was miraculous. I hope they make a statue with a bloody foot for the guy.

Erin Nanstad, fan featured in Still We Believe—The Red Sox Movie: Being at Fenway for the Game 5 victory over the Yankees.

Hazel Mae, NESN sports anchor: For me, the highlight was getting called up from Toronto to join Red Sox Nation!

Question #2: Most satisfying series victory, Yankees or Cardinals?

Bill James: Of course there's a lot of history around the Yankees, but nothing beats the World Championship. That's the big one.

Joseph Abboud: After living in New York City since 1981, it was great to be able to shut the Yankee fans up, but nothing was more gratifying than the World Series.

Bob Neumeier: Yankees, just because you hate them, or maybe just envy them as rivals.

Bill Simmons: Yankees. No question. I knew the Cardinals were going down after they choked away Game 1. The comeback against the Yankees was the greatest comeback of all time, combined with David vs. Goliath (if David has a $120 million payroll).

Edward Cossette: The Cardinals victory became more satisfying because it came after that oh-so-satisfying ALCS.

Dan Shaughnessy: You had to beat the Cardinals to lift the Curse of the Bambino, but you had to beat the Yankees to get there, and that was one for the ages.

David Littlefield, Sausage Guy: Without question, beating the Yankees. I'm thrilled that we had to go through them to win the World Series. It wouldn't have been the same any other way.

Jim Lonborg, former Red Sox pitcher: The Yankees. I had no animosity toward the Cardinals. When they beat us [in 1967] they were the better team, just as the Red Sox were the better team this year.

Jessamy Finet, fan featured in Still We Believe—The Red Sox Movie: The Yankees series was more exciting, but nothing could beat sweeping the Cardinals and knowing that we had finally won it all.

Mayor Menino: The Yankees. There was so much intensity. There are only about four Cardinals fans in Boston—the Yankees were the team that we worried about.

Hazel Mae: No question, the Yankees. You have to revel in any form of doom-and-gloom that's bestowed upon them.

Question #3: Where were you when the Sox won the World Series?

Bob Neumeier: I was in the WEEI radio booth behind longtime Red Sox play-by-play guy Joe Castiglione. It was great because I knew how much it meant to him and everyone who grew up in New England after all the near misses.

Joseph Abboud: I was at home in New York wearing my Nomar T-shirt [Garciaparra is a friend of Abboud's], a Ted Williams hat and a Curt Schilling wristband. I had all my bases covered but wasn't exactly the picture of fashion.

Bill Simmons: At my house writing a running diary of the game for ESPN.com. Not exactly how I imagined it growing up, but I wanted to have a column that people could reread 20 years later and think, "Oh, I remember when that happened." I ended up getting drunk, anyway.

Jessamy Finet: I had taken a flight to Chicago that day, drove down to St. Louis and got to Busch Stadium just in time for the game.

Edward Cossette: Where I was for all the playoff games; at home, splitting time between the couch, pacing the floors, jumping up and down or laying in the middle of the road hoping to get run over.

Bill Lee: In a bar full of Red Sox fans in Mesa, Ariz. One guy took all his clothes off and streaked through the bar when they won.

Erin Nanstad: I called in every favor imaginable, got really lucky and was able to get down to St. Louis for the game.

Johnny Pesky: It was too important for me not to see it in person, so I grabbed a flight to St. Louis so I could be there when they won.

Dane Cook: I was there when the Red Sox won the World Series! The night before the game I got a message from a hookup in St. Louis. I called my dad, who still lives in Arlington, Mass., and told him, "We're going to watch the Red Sox make history, Pops."

Question #4: What do you think the Red Sox' top priorities are this off-season in regard to their potential free agents?

Bill James: From my standpoint, our priority is to act logically in the midst of an emotional whirlwind.

Bob Neumeier: I'd be satisfied with Varitek and either Pedro Martinez or Derek Lowe. Replacing two pitchers of that caliber through free agency is almost impossible.

Bill Simmons: They should bring back the main guys: Pedro, D-Lowe, Cabrera and Varitek. We won the World Series and the owners made about a kajillion dollars. If any team deserves to be kept together, it's that one.

Jessamy Finet: I'm going to have to stick with Derek Lowe because I'm a huge fan. But where would the great pitching be without Varitek?

Bill Lee: They're going to sign them all. I'm holding a meeting with the team next week where I'm going to convince them to run a socialist ball club.

Joseph Abboud: This is like asking me to choose my favorite child, but I think Varitek is key. I have total faith that ownership will make the right moves.

Johnny Pesky: I'm a real Lowe guy, I'd keep him under any circumstances after what he did for this team in the playoffs.

David Littlefield: In one word, Varitek. An incredible leader and, I feel, the Sox' backbone.

Dane Cook: I don't pretend to know what works best. But I'm sure that George Steinbrenner is probably going to try to get the Lord to pitch for him next year.

Erin Nanstad: I have a hard time choosing just because I become so dedicated to every guy on the team. But I do have every Jason Varitek jersey ever made for a reason. iB

SEEING IS BELIEVING

The Red Sox players expected to win all along, even if much of Boston thought they were going to make idiots of us again.

Packing my bags the morning of Monday, October 4, I really had no idea what was going to happen. Well, that's not entirely true. I figured, in the end, it would probably be something resembling two trains crashing head-on.

As always, the Patriots had won the night before. Pats Hall of Famer Steve Nelson was my football guest on NECN that night, and as it turned out, it would be the last time I said the word "football" for a month. How's that possible when the hometown team is by far the best team in the NFL and spends the next three weeks extending its record-setting winning streak? The reason can only be described in two words: Red Sox.

The playoffs started out atypically. I ran into a bunch of the players—Trot Nixon, Tim Wakefield, Johnny Damon, Derek Lowe and Mike Timlin—the night before Game 1 in Anaheim at a local steakhouse. It struck me how surprisingly relaxed everybody was, but earlier that day at the team workout, Johnny Damon had informed me that this group is too dumb to have emotions like nervousness.

Regardless, I asked the group if they were ready. They all laughed before D-Lowe said, "We'll probably do what we always do. Get the Angels right where we want them and drop the first two games of the series." Everybody at the table nodded their heads and agreed.

Though the comments were made in jest, the feeling I came away with that night was unequivocal. Those players thought they were the best baseball team in the world.

The Anaheim series seems so long ago, but it will always be remembered as the series where David Ortiz, aka "Big Papi," started his assault on the moniker of "Mr. October," or shall I say "Señor October," a modern-day Sultan of Swat with a flair for the dramatic.

Three quick wins capped off by Señor October's walk-off home run, and it was on to what every red-blooded New Englander had waited 12 months for: a date with the Yankees.

After a pit stop in Boston, I traveled to Yankee Stadium not feeling too well. Memories of 2003 and Game 7 were fresh. I kept telling myself the Red Sox didn't blow a 5–2 lead, in the eighth inning, in Game 7 of the American League Championship Series.

But as I stepped into Yankee Stadium for the first time since that awful April Fools' joke of October 2003, the sight of that damn 2003 American League pennant was a constant affirmation that it was no joke. The 2003 ALCS was an early Halloween with no treats, just a bad trick.

After picking the Red Sox to win the ALCS last year and remembering how angry I was at the entire world upon the completion of that series, I vowed that I'd never be fooled again. So what did I do this year? I gave my best Don King impersonation and told anyone who would listen that the Red Sox were better than the Yankees and they wouldn't need seven games to right all that was wrong in the world. Six games, at most, and on to the World Series, I proclaimed.

Before I knew it, the Red Sox were down 3–0 to the Yankees, and three outs away from seeing their season end miserably again. Three outs from making me look like an idiot...again.

David Ortiz was "Señor October" in the 2004 playoffs.

THREE QUICK WINS AND IT WAS ON TO WHAT EVERY NEW ENGLANDER HAD WAITED 12 MONTHS FOR: A DATE WITH THE YANKEES.

But that scene in the Anaheim steakhouse came back to me. The Red Sox had a saying in the clubhouse after golfer Phil Mickelson, a constant runner-up in the big tournaments, finally won the Masters this past spring. They said if Mickelson can win, why not us? Mickelson was considered the best golfer in the world never to win a major. And we all know the Sox owned the equivalent status in baseball.

Before the start of ALCS Game 4, a couple of things struck me. I was sitting in the dugout with some of my contemporaries in the media, in a miserable mood, when Johnny Damon came in whistling a tune before asking, "Why is everyone so down?"

Is this guy nuts, I thought to myself? Then I remembered who I was dealing with. Yes, JD is nuts.

Another memorable scene was Red Sox first baseman Kevin Millar jawing with a Yankee broadcaster. The boisterous and always entertaining Millar (he really should do stand-up in the off-season) was screaming across the field, "You know the toughest game of the series is the clinching game. After we get that one we've got Pedro coming back tomorrow, after that it's Schilling in Game 6. Then on to Game 7 when anything can happen."

When Millar stopped walking, I cornered him at the batting cages and asked him if that was really his plan. He snapped, "Guaranteed."

Underneath the comedy skit, Millar made cogent points. The series really wasn't over, and soon, the pressure was on the Yankees. And remember, when he said these things, nobody was sure if Schilling would even be able to pitch, never mind beat the Yankees. Millar, we later found out, was right about many other things, like Ortiz in October and those damn Yankees not being able to seal the clinching game. Before you could say "1918," the Red Sox had done everything Millar said they would do and tied the series.

Before Game 7, I stood on that same field, the one I stood on about this time last year with such angst and disbelief. But something had happened prior to this Game 7 evening. Since Game 4, the breaks and questionable calls had suddenly gone the Red Sox's way. And when Game 7 came, they didn't beat the Yankees—they obliterated them. I stood in the clubhouse with Ortiz, who was holding onto the ALCS MVP trophy, thinking, "My God, the Red Sox won Game 7."

Before I'd signed off the air of my NECN broadcast I had no less than 20 calls from friends and family looking for World Series tickets. I can only imagine how many calls Señor October got.

I'd never been to a World Series, professionally or privately, but like everyone who grew up in New England, I knew a dozen or so people who claimed they were at Game 6 of the 1975 World Series and saw, live and in-person, Carlton Fisk's home run in extra innings. Now it was my turn, after six years of covering sports in Boston. I was ready to witness history.

Two quick wins in Boston and another early-morning flight—to St. Louis for Game 3 with Pedro pitching—and even the Sox' traditional bad World Series karma couldn't stop this steamroller. I went on the air after the Game 3 win with a broom in hand declaring the Sox would sweep the Cardinals the next night. I'd quit laughing at Millar's claims because now they finally made sense (and that in itself was a revelation—Millar making sense).

Of course, after the broom routine the hate mail started clogging up my e-mail account. Beat-up members of Red Sox Nation said I was jinxing the team. I understood their concerns, but after witnessing every single playoff game in person, nothing was going to alter my optimistic mindset.

This time, the team celebrating at the end of October was our team. New England was starving for a World Series title and finally, after 86 years and endless taunts of "1918!" emanating from metropolitan New York, it was all over.

The Red Sox are world champs. I know it happened, I saw it happen, but I'm still not sure I really believe it. IB

THE ORIGINAL PINT BOTTLE & ICE

decking THE SHELVES

Local boutique owners give us a preview of what's in store this holiday season.

BY ALICIA ABELL

Your feet hurt, you're hungry and you still can't figure out what to buy for austere Aunt Margaret. If you see one more poncho, you might have to call the fashion police, and—wait, did that woman just cut in line!?

Ahh, 'tis the season... Shopping season, that is. And while we all know what it's like to fight the crowds in the hunt for holiday treasure, have you ever wondered how it is on the other side of the cash register? To find out, we talked to the owners of some of Boston's hippest boutiques. We asked them how they're preparing for the shopping surge, what they're betting will be hot gifts this year and how they feel about the holiday hoopla. Here's what they had to say.

Abodeon carries modern design furniture as well as unique pieces like this lamp made from an old-fashioned hair dryer.

Vintage stapler–bottle opener, at Abodeon.

ABODEON

When asked how he feels about the holiday season, Abodeon's Dale Anderson can't help but laugh. "I'm ambivalent about it," he says. "Before opening this store, I rebelled against the whole Christmas thing, all the money-spending. But now I'm pretty dependent on it. And when the store's full of people, I love it."

So how do Anderson and wife Terri, co-owner of the Cambridge boutique, prepare for the feeding frenzy? The first task is to slowly change the layout of the store: Because it gets so crowded beginning in late November, the Andersons reduce the number of furniture displays, so people can move around more easily. They also modify the lighting, adding wattage as days get darker earlier and the store stays open later. In addition, they save some of their favorite merchandise for December. "We want people to come in and say, 'Wow, look at this,'" says Dale.

Terri came up with the store's name. It's meant to combine the words "abode" and "beyond," and the shop lives up to the moniker. Modern-design furniture and home goods make up most of the merchandise, but attentive shoppers will find plenty of vintage items and one-of-a-kind gifts, like a 1940s stapler with a bottle opener on the bottom ($48) or a 1930s-style hair dryer that's been made into a lamp ($275), as well as unique products like the Morph, a sculptable notepaper pad ($18.50).

In keeping with the vintage theme, Abodeon also boasts a small, discreet record room in a back corner of the store. The nook houses 5,000 or so albums at any one time, mostly jazz and rock from the 1950s and '60s. According to Dale, Joe Strummer, the late former Clash singer, visited Abodeon the week it first opened and said it had the best record collection he'd seen.

If you're looking for a useful gift, Dale recommends bamboo, a popular trend this year. "They now have sustainable bamboo farms in China, and they're making some extraordinary things," he explains. Not only is bamboo harder than most types of wood, it also absorbs less water and is more resistant to bacteria, making it ideal for cutting boards, salad bowls, sushi sets and other kitchen ware. He also thinks Japanese pottery will be popular. For years, Anderson says, there was a distinction between products the Japanese made for export and those they made for the Japanese market. ("Made in Japan" used to be as common as "made in China" is nowadays, he notes.) But that difference is rapidly dwindling, and beautiful, handmade pieces are selling for remarkably low prices—a set of four high-fired bowls can cost as little as $24.

Anderson says Boston shoppers like these types of gifts because "people here are well educated and smart. They're able to discern quality objects from poor materials." Other characteristics of Boston shoppers? Believe it or not, they tend to start their holiday shopping early, he says. "At the least, they're trying to avoid the madness that happens the last two weeks." He does report, however, that one Abodeon regular comes in every year on Christmas Eve, spends 15 minutes picking out several thousand dollars worth of gifts and then says, "Bag it up, and I'll be back in a half hour to pick it up."

1731 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (between Harvard and Porter squares), 617-497-0137. Open 10 am–8 pm daily through Christmas

MATSU

For Dava Muramatsu, owner of this Newbury Street boutique, the best part of the holiday season is that Bostonians have more fun. "People are more open to taking risks in terms of what they're wearing," she says. "All the occasions and chances to dress up… It gives them an excuse to be more daring style-wise."

THE BUYING GAME

A bevy of new shops will shake up your holiday spree.

Cross

The hunt for stylish accessories for your favorite organization freak ends here. Notepads, designer laptop cases, ribbon-bound journals and Italian stationery are available in kicky color schemes like powder blue–and–chocolate brown, and burnt and day-glo orange. Almost as noteworthy as Cross' stock are the displays, arranged with such painstakingly color-coordinated detail that truly obsessive neatniks and type A's might enjoy browsing here as much as buying. 0 Brattle St., Cambridge, 617-868-7020. Mon.–Wed., 10 am– 7 pm; Thu., 10 am–8 pm; Fri.–Sat., 10 am–9 pm; Sun, 12–6 pm.

The latest addition to the South End's smattering of trendy boutiques carries cashmere "tattoo" sweaters by Raw 7, coats and cashmere ponchos, and jeans, bags and jewelry by such hard-to-find designers as How & Wen, Ya-Ya, Yanuk and Kooba. 652 Tremont St., Boston, 617-247-4200. Tue.–Fri., 11 am–7 pm; Sat., 11 am–6 pm; Sun., 12–5 pm.

Luna

It's high time the god-awful logo bag (you know, the ones covered in tiny G's for Gucci, C's for Coach and LV's for Louis Vuitton) epidemic was wiped out. Newbury Street handbag and accessory boutique Luna packs a hefty dose of high-end labels like Kooba, Buzz by Jane Fox, and Lorelei that just might do the trick. Owner Sarah Johnson strives to stock brands that rival LV and Gucci in quality but aren't quite as standard-issue. 286 Newbury St., Boston, 617-262-3900. Daily, 11 am–7 pm.

Magic Beans

If nothing else, television shows like I Love the '90s and Best Week Ever reaffirm the popular obsession with the very recent past. Gen X-ers looking to wax nostalgic over their not-so-distant youth can head to Coolidge Corner's Magic Beans. It looks like a kids' toy store, but owner Sheri Gurock says twenty- and thirty-somethings have been going ga-ga for items like Trivial Pursuit '90s Time Capsule Edition and the new Cabbage Patch Kids and Smurf figurines. 312 Harvard St., Brookline, 617-264-2326. Mon.–Wed., Fri. & Sat., 10 am–7 pm; Thu. 10 am–9 pm; Sun., 12–5 pm.

Mint Julep

This boutique owned by childhood friends Brooke Garber and Stephanie Nist is perhaps Coolidge Corner's only women's fashion destination. Trendy trappings range from fancy dresses by Helen Wang and Cynthia Steffe to casual and colorful Splendid T-shirts to kitschy Yiddish logo tees ("Oy Vey") by the Rabbi's Daughter. Other must-have brands of the moment include Joe's Jeans, Alice & Olivia, Ben Sherman and Mint. 1302 Beacon St., Brookline, 617-232-3600. Mon.–Sat., 10 am–7 pm; Sun., 11 am–6 pm.

Remedix

Remedix's all-natural bath and body line might be the first beauty regimen inspired by a Communist regime. Boutique owner Claudia Starkey grew up in Cold War–era Romania where a simple bar of soap was considered a luxury. Instead of waiting around in a bleak beauty haze, Starkey used minerals, ground flowers and fruits from the Transylvanian forest to create her own products. Now she sells her all-natural, handmade potions like Pink Clay facial cleanser, Babassu Butter moisturizing cream, Orange Turbinado Sugar body polish or Rose Petal facial exfoliator at her Newbury Street shop. 279 Newbury St., Boston, 617-437-1155. Mon.–Sat., 10 am–8 pm; Sun., 11 am–6 pm.

The Ruby Door

Set just off Charles Street, this plucky jewelry and accessories boutique is as charming as its Beacon Hill surroundings. It stocks Miller Grove Designs beaded jewelry and slick leather clutches and handbags from Ply that can't be found in department stores. Among the more unique pieces are chunky resin rings by Angelique, lemon citrine chokers and mink shawls. 92B Pinckney St., Boston, 617-720-2001. Mon.–Tue., Sat., 11 am–6 pm; Wed.–Fri., 11 am–7 pm.; Sun., 12–5 pm.

Stel's

From vintage belts to the latest in high-end urban wear for men and women, Newbury Street newcomer Stel's stocks an enviable array of under-the-radar Italian and American designers that include Petro Zillia, Trunk, Gary Graham and Coast & Weber. Expect nothing less from the trio of owners whose retail repertoire includes stints at Louis Boston and Ermenegildo Zegna. 334 Newbury St., Boston, 617-262-3348. Mon.–Sat., 11 am–8 pm; Sun. 12–6 pm.

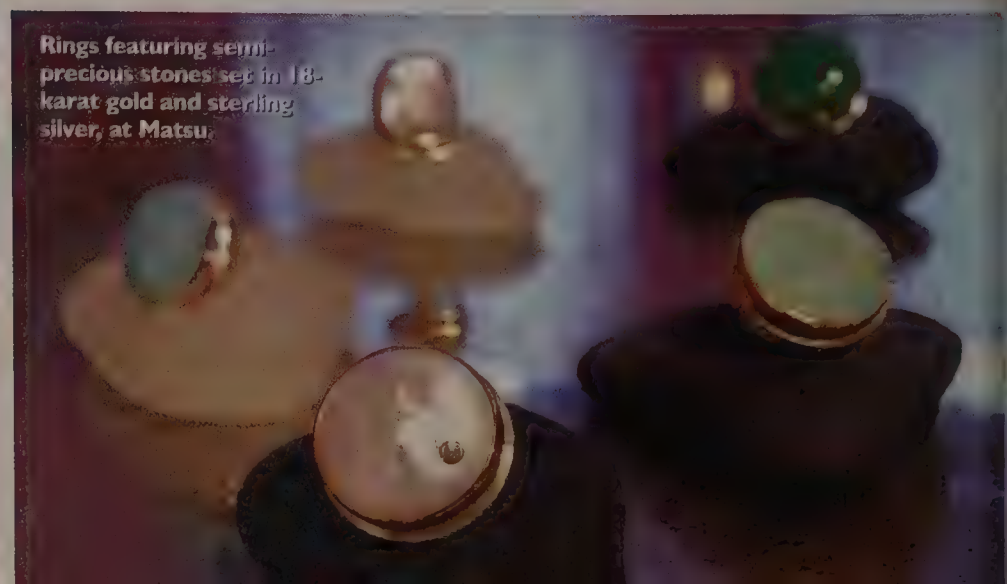
In fact, it's an attitude she wishes shoppers would adopt year-round. Because Boston is such an intellectual area, Muramatsu says, people make fashion decisions from their head and not their heart. "Maybe it has something to do with the weather too. But let's bundle up in color, and not navy blue and khaki!"

Muramatsu's philosophy is to stimulate people through their senses. At her store, you'll find gifts for the fashion-forward woman on your shopping list. Exotic music plays in the background, and artsy, avant-garde pieces like aprons and deconstructed T-shirts line the pink and lime green walls.

In addition to clothing in a range of textures, Matsu carries perfumes and candles, jewelry, accessories and a few home goods as well. Favorite designers include Lilith, Rozae Nichols and Comme des Garcons. As for this year's trends, "I think color will be big," Muramatsu says, "as well as anything that dazzles, like stones and jewelry." Other timely gifts? Cashmere sweaters, velvet pants, anything purple and anything embellished.

For the holidays, Muramatsu also creates whimsical, prepackaged gift bundles (think $200 handbags with body-and-bath goodies inside). The store also offers an unofficial "holiday registry." Customers tell staffers what they want, and boyfriends and husbands can come in and purchase the gifts later.

"The men are the best," Muramatsu says. They're generally last-minute. They're so innocent, and they really want your help. They're just so charming."



259 Newbury St., Boston, 617-266-9707. Mon.–Wed. 11 am–6 pm, Thu.–Sat. 11 am–7 pm, Sun. 1–6 pm.

TURTLE

In general, "stuff gets fancier" around the holidays, says Storey Hieronymus Hauck, so she stocks her South End boutique, Turtle, with extra party clothes, shawls, scarves and jewelry at this time of year. Starting in November, she also puts more gift-type items, from address books to fun pajamas and cashmere robes, on the shelves. Turtle's mission is to showcase emerging designers, but while the clothes here have an individual feel, they aren't overly avant-garde, and there's as much feminine frippery as there is urban edge.

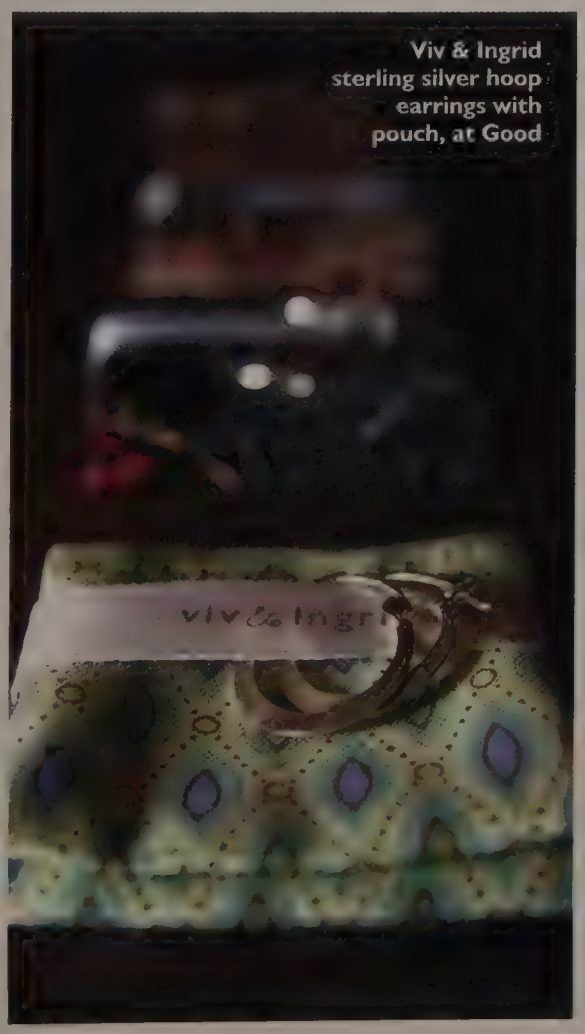
Matsu owner Dava Muramatsu's philosophy is to stimulate shoppers through their senses.

Rings featuring semi-precious stones set in 18-karat gold and sterling silver, at Matsu.

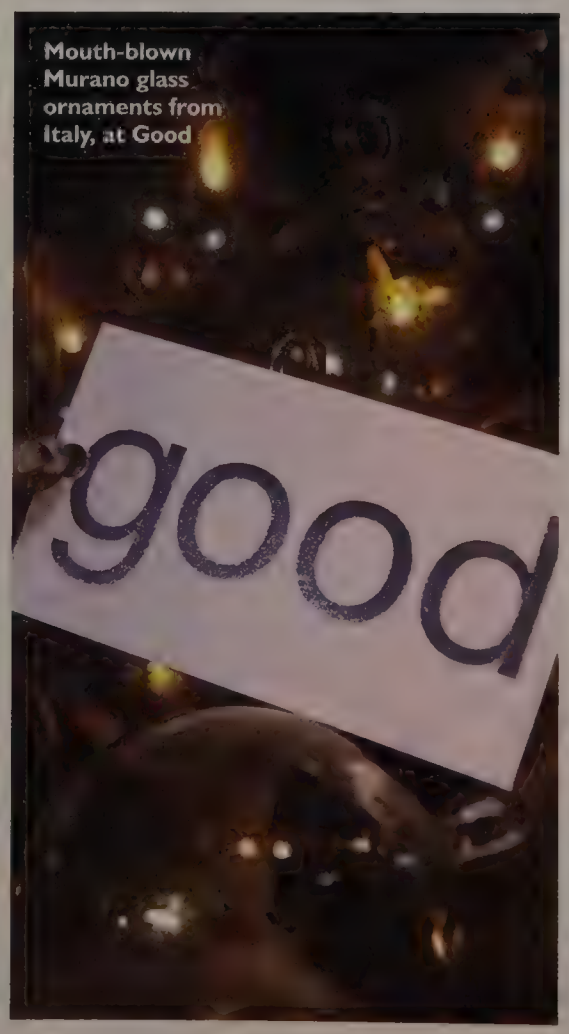
Felt brooches at Turtle

Hauck doesn't fixate on trends, but she does have some predictions for the upcoming season. In addition to the two C's—cashmere and color—she expects vintage-style pieces to be popular. Pink and purple will be hot hues this year, and shoppers will continue to look for sparkle and shine. Overall, she says, "there's probably more glitz" than in seasons past.

As for gift options, cashmere sweaters and the ubiquitous poncho are good choices, Hauck says. Shoppers looking for other ideas can come to one of three trunk shows—featuring cashmere, handbags and jewelry, respectively—on successive weekends in December. (Prices at the jewelry trunk show will range from $40 to $75.) And muddled males are invited to a "men's night," on December 16 (from 5 to 9 pm), where they can get special attention and help picking out presents.



Last year, Hauck recalls, one guy came in looking for a gift for his girlfriend but had no idea what he wanted. She and her colleagues suggested a night out on the town and a dress, shawl and jewelry to match. It's this kind of personalized attention that makes shopping in boutiques so special, Hauck says—and makes her job so much fun.



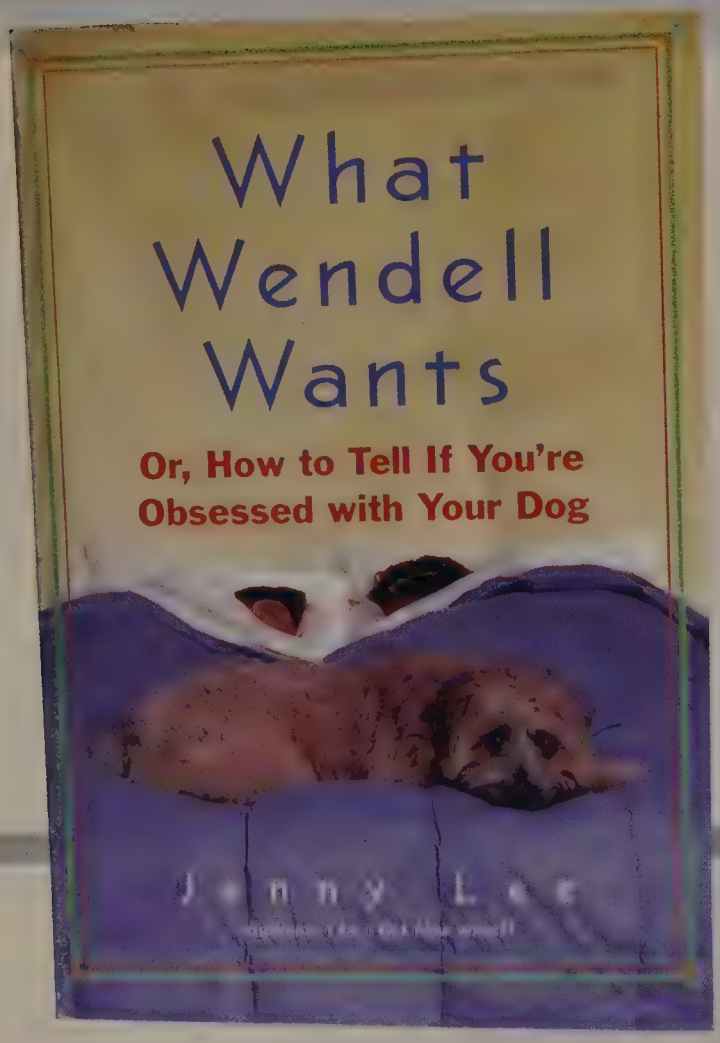
619 Tremont St., Boston, 617-266-2610. Tue.–Fri. 11 am–7 pm, Sat. 10 am–7 pm, Sun. 12–5 pm; extended hours in December.

GOOD

While Beacon Hill's Good has a reputation as a home store, its owner, Paul Niski, says his real mission is to find "beautiful objects," whatever they may be. The result is an eclectic mix of home items, furniture, jewelry and accessories.

Despite Good's hip, minimalist feel, it stocks both vintage and modern merchandise. Contemporary Chinese porcelain shares shelves with china from the 1800s, and stylish new jewelry abuts antique brooches. Prices also range widely. "People assume we're very expensive because we're on Beacon Hill," says Niski, "but we have a whole selection of 1950s vintage pins starting at $20, and necklaces that go up to $1,500. We try to do the ridiculous and the reasonable." Catering to the "reasonable" end, he selects some 20 gifts of $50 or less for the holiday season and displays them in piles of presents, wrapped and ready to go.

As part of the new "First Thursday" series organized by a group of Beacon Hill boutiques, Niski will keep Good open until 8:30 pm on December 2, offering cocktails, plus 15 percent off everything in the store. He expects products by Italian designer Luisa Cevese—who makes lovely, one-of-a-kind handbags, change purses and placemats from textile scraps—to be particularly popular.



So what does Niski, who moved here from New York, think of Boston shoppers? "Compared to people from other metropolitan areas, Bostonians take longer to decide," he says. "They're thoughtful consumers, not impulsive." They're also more price-conscious, he adds, with a twinkle in his eye. "It's part of that quintessential Yankee thrift."

88 Charles St., Boston, 617-722-9200. Mon.–Fri. 11–7, Sat. 10 am–6 pm, Sun. 12–5 pm; later hours selected nights in December. IB

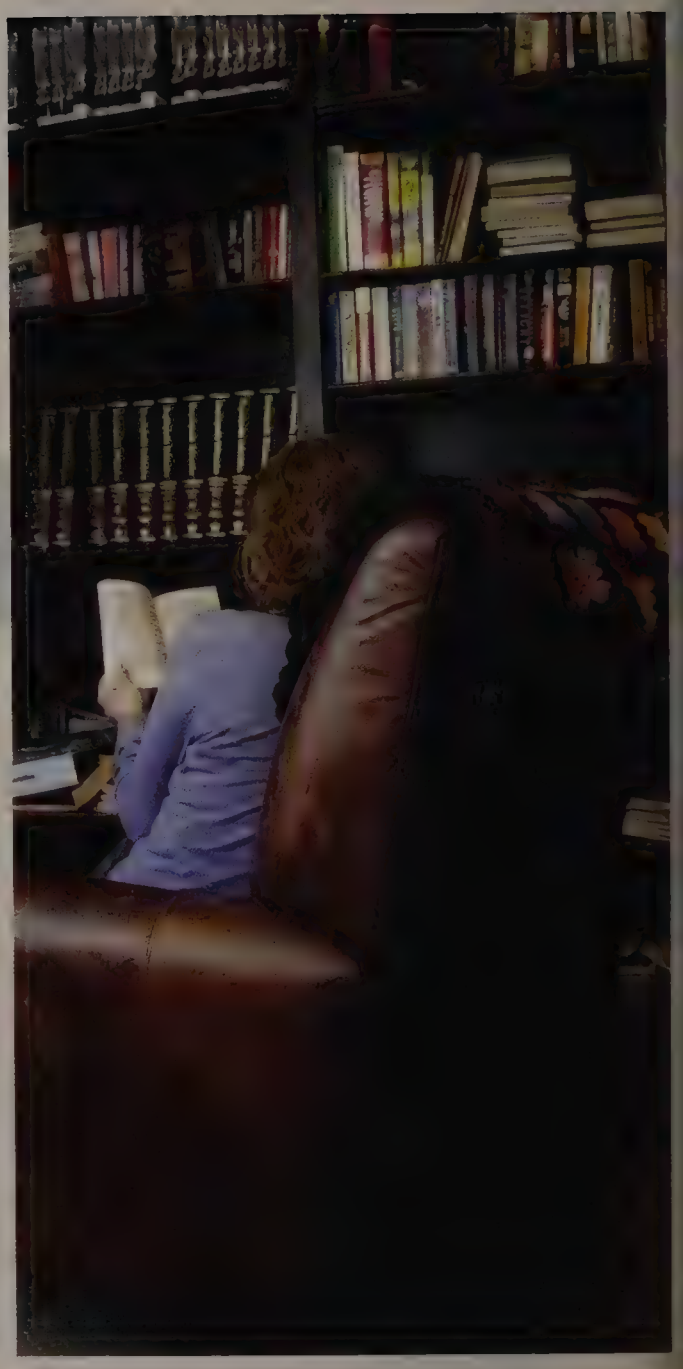
NO DOG LEFT BEHIND



Cambridge writer Jenny Lee, author of I Do! I Did! Now What?, a book about her marriage, has a new dog book: What Wendell Wants—Or, How to Tell if You're Obsessed With Your Dog.

Jenny Lee lives with her husband on a street named after her dog—Wendell. (Well, who really knows which came first!) Her breathlessly shameless confessions—which will for many elicit a blush of guilty identification—detail the drama-Mama devotion she lavishes upon her wonderful wheaten terrier. After detailing in each chapter the lengths she'll go to gratify her dog's needs (and very high-end needs they are too), she provides a quiz so you can see how you score, crazydoglove-wise—Lee scores a perfect 800 in obsession. What with birthday-cake commissioning, will-writing (provisions for doggy in the case of some God-forbid event), coif-perfecting and portrait-commissioning, Lee's in a love triangle in which her doctor-husband is the sometimes bemused, sometimes annoyed, and often left-out party—though he gamely devotes hours to "squeak-replacement" surgery, putting the rubbery noisemaker back into Wendell's toy. And he patiently repairs the marital wound inflicted by his carelessly calling the anointed canine "just a dog." Lee is at least aware of her besotted condition; hence the book's charm.

HELPING YOUR FELLOW WOMAN

On the Rise Safe Haven, at 341 Broadway, in Cambridge, is a daytime program for women struggling with homelessness or other life problems. Volunteer opportunities are available. Call 617-497-7968 or see the donation "Wish List" at www.ontherise.org.

Women dealing with crises including homelessness, addictions, domestic violence or legal issues come to the welcoming arms of this pretty Victorian corner house, which provides about 25 women daily with a comfortable and sympathetic place to visit as they tackle issues that constrain and define their lives. Calling itself "the mortar between the bricks" On the Rise helps these women put together the resources—legal, medical and housing support, and referrals—that they'll need to eventually get their lives back on track. Legal and medical professionals visit On the Rise weekly, and the staff works holistically to help the women figure out what they need to do to achieve greater safety and solidity in their lives. Offerings, pragmatic and some fun ones, include a nap room, washing machines, showers, art classes and even massages. Volunteer opportunities include offering your skills to work on a specific pro bono project, or enlisting a group to bring a cooked meal on a regular basis (or even just once). On the Rise also seeks donations of clothing, shampoo and toiletries. Or you can contribute money in the name of a philanthropically minded friend, say, in lieu of a birthday present.

A SCREEN OF GREEN AND SUBTLE COLOR

Winston Flowers has eight retail locations, including at 131 Newbury St. and 569 Boylston St. in Boston. Or go to their larger Winston Flowers and Garden at Route 9 and Florence Street, in Newton, which offers garden consultations as well as flowers and plants for events. Call 800-457-4901.

The wide-open, stony gray space in which Winston Flowers and Garden is located provides a hushed purity, almost sere and medieval, that highlights these green plants. Displayed in burgeoning bursts, plants tend to be arranged in effective multiplications of the same variety; vivid muchness, self-contained. One of their fascinating bromeliads, for instance, has tart spikes of green with what looks rather like praying pink hands in the middle; out of that center sometimes spurts a little purple flower. Three together form a mini-hedge. Winston's has droopy feather boa-like amaranthus, crimson or green. Celosia is another flower that gratifies with a little mountaintop of red blooms tiptoeing over a tight furry stem. The fatigue-green "air plant" sits on a nest of its own roots. Winston's European garden furniture matches the gigantic metal urns from which you expect a Delphic sage to emerge: pale-colored log-like planters on legs of faux bois, garden adornments made of old tin ceiling materials and mirrors, and a large stone lion fountain suggesting, or requiring, an estate.

STEADY MANTRA

New executive chef Ernie Quinones has ensured Mantra will remain in Boston's culinary elite.

When Thomas John accepted a managerial position in a large, locally headquartered food service organization, he left big shoes to fill as departing executive chef of Mantra. John had been successful in establishing Mantra as one of a half dozen premiere dining venues in Boston, with a fusion cuisine that combined imaginative, creative flavors—distinguished by well-chosen Mediterranean and Asian herbs and spices—with classic, culinary instincts and know-how. When Ernie Quinones was named as John's successor, there was some skepticism among Mantra's devotees. Quinones had served as the restaurant's pastry chef, and while his performance as such had been superlative, some wondered whether he could assume responsibility for the whole menu.

Fortunately for Mantra, and for Boston gastronomes, Quinones' stewardship has yielded remarkably superb and consistent results. His passion and enthusiasm for his trade, his unassuming and unpretentious manner, and his old-fashioned hard work have confirmed Mantra as a first rate dining destination, a place to which the Michelin guide writers would recommend not just a detour but a voyage.

A graduate of the Culinary Institute of America, Quinones is hooked on flavor, which he coaxes from intense vegetable reductions. These, in lieu of conventional thickeners, give flavorful body to sauces, enhanced by a deft hand on a repertoire of herbs and spices ranging from basil and cumin to ginger, coriander, cilantro, cinnamon and star anise.

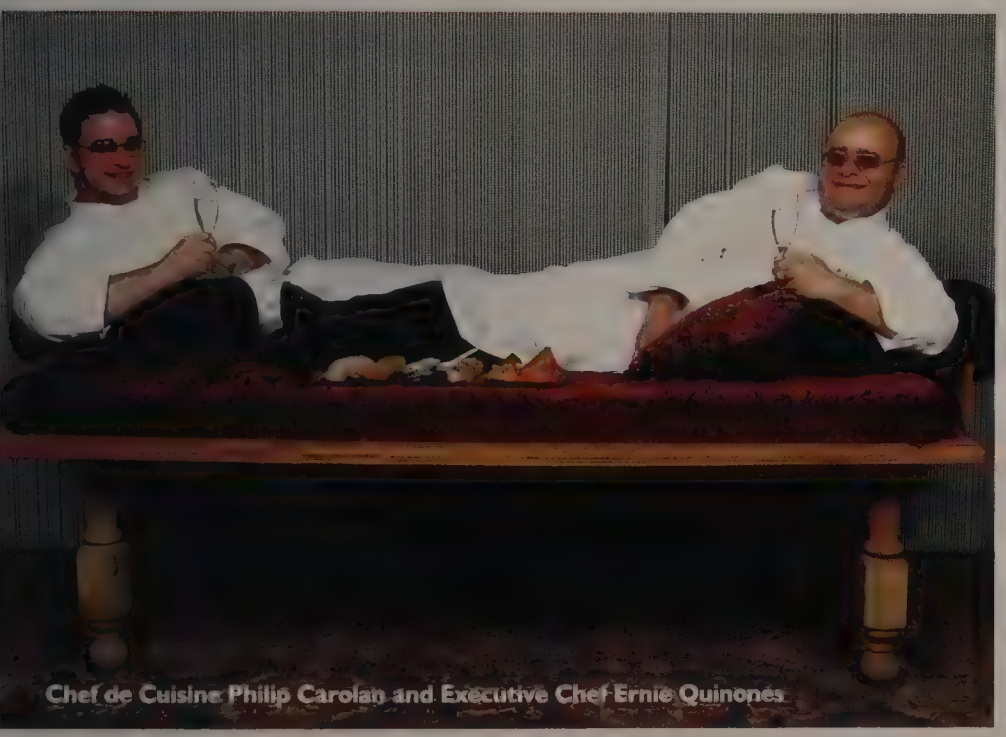
On one lunchtime and two evening visits, I experienced a veritable symphony of tastes, textures and aromas. At dinner one night an amuse gueule of rare tuna topped by a thin slice of salty prosciutto and garnished with tiny dollops of wasabi mayonnaise titillated our taste buds, while on a subsequent visit a more prosaic but nonetheless delicious roast salmon with cilantro delighted. Among Mantra's appetizers, celeriac (celery root) soup ($8) with pumpkin seed, squash and crème fraîche proved a heady brew, filling but not ponderous. More extravagantly priced, but worth every penny, were the sea scallops ($18). The kitchen seared these three mammoth mollusks, almost two inches across, to a moist, perfect texture, their sweet, nutlike flavor intact. Resilient lobster mushrooms and pleasantly bitter endive accompanied the scallops along with a seductively toothsome sauce based on a red pepper reduction, spiced with cinnamon and star anise. This portion was large enough to have served as a main course and proved ample for sharing as an appetizer.

Appetizers at lunch included vegetable momos ($6), five delicate moist, steamed Himalayan dumplings wrapped in tender, thin, translucent wrappers, and filled with savory cabbage, carrots and celery. A provocative ginger sauce spiked with mustard and black onion seed made these exquisite, palate-pleasing pillows memorable. Less successful but still tasty were lamb samosas ($7), three gram-flour turnovers stuffed with pulled lamb—actually more ground than pulled—accompanied by a baby tomato sauce with a mild, exotic sweetness, with perhaps a touch of citric bite. I received conflicting reports from two different servers about whether it contained tamarind, the classic Indian citrus flavor.

Between appetizer and main courses in the evening, Mantra served an intermezzo of passion fruit sorbet, an effective and welcome palate cleanser. The main courses that followed included spice-roasted lamb ($29), juicy, rare and full-flavored, accompanied by onion leek compote, baby eggplant, and spinach seasoned with garlic, cumin and coriander. Wild striped bass and curried mussels ($28) came garnished with napa cabbage, fresh coconut and fingerling potatoes. The first-rate texture of both the fish and the vegetable accompaniments distinguished this dish, which needed little in the way of herbal embellishment to render it delicious. Clay oven–roasted monkfish ($28) brought a substantial hunk of firm-textured fish served on a bed of wilted spinach made heady with garlic and accompanied by a sweet pepper chutney redolent of cilantro.

Moving from sea to land, the tamarind-glazed poussin ($28), a young spring chicken, boasted crisp skin and moist flesh, and a dazzling array of garnishes that included al dente potato salad, tiny lima beans and a chutney of plum tomatoes and bell peppers redolent of bay leaf, coriander, basil and cumin. Finally among the dinner main courses was the venison tenderloin ($27). The robust, gamy flavor of venison calls for assertive, often fruit based accompaniments. Mantra rose to the occasion with a cherry peppercorn reduction that complemented these two tender, rare slices of venison fillet. Sautéed broccoli rabe and a cylinder of sliced potatoes rounded out the ensemble.

Luncheon entrées, like the luncheon appetizers, occupied the Asian side of the fusion spectrum. Saag makai ($12) brought a small casserole of creamed minced spinach with black cumin, corn and tomatoes, seasoned with lively fresh ginger and accompanied by basmati rice. The dish was superb enough to tempt me to sign up as a vegetarian—at least until the tandoor chicken tikka ($9) arrived. This large portion of tender, juicy chunks of chicken marinated with yogurt, cardamom and cumin presented a distinct contrast to most tandoori meats that I've experienced. Far from dry, the chicken arrived moist and flavorful, and the garnish of refreshingly cool slices of marinated cucumber and greens hit the spot.



A review of Mantra would not be complete without discussing its breads. At lunch, breads were served à la carte, but they merited the price. The olive naan ($3), a light, moist bread with thinly sliced olives between its gossamer layers, was served with a spread of cilantro and cashew chutney. In the evening, breads accompany the meal without extra cost, and included flavorful potato rolls and Boston brown bread studded with raisins from Cambridge's High Rise Bakery, as well as more interesting Indian flat breads, such as naan and poori, made on the premises.

Mantra's wine list was first-rate. Although thin in the lower price ranges, it included affordable options such as a 2002 Tavel rosé ($30) that combined intense flavor, good acidity and a clean finish. Equally enjoyable was the 2003 Beaujolais from the commune of Morgon, Côte du Py, by Jean Marc Burgaud, which definitive demonstrated that Beaujolais doesn't have to be a fruity, frivolous quaff, and the region can produce wines of considerable finesse and depth ($35).

After feasting on herb- and spice-infused appetizers and main courses, I was almost relieved to arrive at the familiar, comfortable territory of dessert. Fallen chocolate espresso soufflé ($9), a variation on a familiar theme, arrived atop a banana foundation. This combination of milk and dark chocolate, drizzled with dark chocolate sauce, provided the fitting punctuation mark to conclude a fabulous meal.

Mantra's physical environment, which has been written about extensively, is almost over the top. The classical lines of an old bank building with high-tech and outré touches such as the hookah den (with smoking banned in Boston restaurants, the elaborately sculpted enclosure is now relegated to private parties or cocktails), an imposing golden colored statue of Buddha, and restrooms that became the talk of Boston when first unveiled, have all survived the change of regime in the kitchen. And to be sure, Chef Quinones has preserved the most important aspect of this estimable eatery: imaginative, sometimes exotic and provocative, but always delicious and satisfying cuisine. iB

Lucy's Loosens Up

Just add oil and a happy chef...

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

For a long time, lots of people didn't love Lucy's. The Coolidge Corner eatery was respected, maybe, but loved? No. Owner Mitzi Kaitz's philosophy of healthy, very low-fat dining was a worthy concept that came up short in execution. When all fats are dissed, the flavor will be missed. And since BYOB (bring your own butter) would be silly, Kaitz took stock of the situation and made two key decisions. First, she dropped the ban on oil, and even allowed the baking of desserts with butter (under the new, liberal regime, butter is available for bread by request). Then she hired Eric Bogardus, former executive sous chef at Locke-Ober, to run the newly lubricated kitchen.

Bogardus took one look at the old menu, and realized "it definitely wasn't my style. I could see what they were going for, but nothing compensated for the [lack of] butter. It wasn't up to par with what Mitzi wanted for the restaurant." To create a new menu—healthful, but with enough fat and flavor to please people with palates—Bogardus drew on his experience cooking with Jacky Robert at Locke-Ober and Daniele Baliani at the former Pignoli, and on his degree in anthropology. Anthropology?

"It goes hand-in-hand with cooking," says Bogardus, who travels to Mexico every year with friends to cook produce from the local markets and fish he's caught by himself. He's been to Italy, France, Germany and Egypt; worked in catering, bread baking, cake decorating and as a kosher trainer; and brought the sum of his experiences to bear on the totally revamped menu at Lucy's. (Actually, the cheese plate is still on the menu). Bogardus is already envisioning his winter menu—"I'm thinking about bison short ribs, cassoulet"—but in the meantime, the fall fare includes some real treats. Kabocha squash soup with roasted corn, black beans, chilies and curried croutons is vegan, gluten-free and deeply, sumptuously flavorful. The "Forager's Delight" mushroom pizza, from the wood-burning stove, is a sensual delight of earthy mushrooms, parmesan, sweet caramelized onion, and sun-dried tomato. The warm goat cheese tart with figs, grilled pear slices, and cinnamon syrup tastes like a smoky autumn afternoon.

Lucy's is lucky to have Bogardus, and even if he continues his world travels, it seems a safe bet he'll return happily to the Brookline kitchen. He eats his own food, and he's lost 30 pounds since he took the job eight months ago. "I love it," he says. "Nothing's better than the people being happy eating the food you've cooked."

New chef Eric Bogardus has buttered up the menu at Lucy's.

SECOND COURSE

Opening: Out in Deep Suburbia, specifically Southboro, Tommaso Trattoria has opened under the guidance of general manager/wine guy Lorenzo Savona.

Updates: Chef Carmen Quagliata, who's been "looking for a place" to call his own since The Vault closed last November, is this close to nailing down a venue in a Boston suburb. Meanwhile, he's been cooking around town, helping out chef Rene Michelina at Saint and working with Bill Bradley on the opening of Rustic Kitchen in Cambridge. If all goes according to plan, Quagliata will open his Italian restaurant by the end of January with longtime sous chef Adam Laliberte. Steve Johnson, former chef/owner of the Blue Room in Cambridge, is back in town after spending the summer in Westport "working on my fishing skills." Now, he's working on his real estate skills, exploring various restaurant-worthy sites in Cambridge. "I'm interested in getting back into the business," he says. "I miss it. I've looked at 50 places so far, at least on paper." We'll let you know when he picks one. iB

PREVIEW

BEAUJOLAIS SOIREES

Football fans have Super Bowl Sunday, children have Halloween and wine connoisseurs have the third Thursday of November, or as the French call it, le jour le Beaujolais Nouveau est arrivé. Beaujolais Nouveau is probably the closest to a white wine that a red can be, in that it's meant to be served chilled (at about 55°F) and drunk quickly, and it also lacks the strong acidity that you'll find in most reds. In other words, it's perfect for partying. Each year, more than 100 festivals in France celebrate the release of the new vintage, but if you can't make it across the pond, a number of local celebrations are helping to fill the void. On Wednesday, November 17, Brasserie Jo hosts a Moulin Rouge–themed dinner ($40) at 9 pm, complete with can-can dancers and cabaret music all night long. At the stroke of midnight, the party culminates with the unveiling of the 2004 Beaujolais Nouveau. The next night, Pigalle hosts a special three-course dinner paired with Beaujolais ($48) from 5:30–8 pm, and at Les Zygomates, sommelier Geoffrey Fallon hosts a special five-course educational wine dinner at 7 pm, entitled 10 Things You Probably Didn't Know About Beaujolais ($65). Brasserie Jo, 120 Huntington Ave., Boston (617-425-3740); Pigalle, 75 Charles St. South, Boston (617-423-4944); Les Zygomates, 129 South St., Boston (617-542-5108).

Tastings: Sudsy Science

For the latest installment in its dinner/lecture series, the Museum of Science turns its attention to the weighty matter of the Science Behind Beer. Boston Beer Co. brewer and founder Jim Koch serves as master of ceremonies, explaining the appeal of pairing foods with beers, from pilsner to porter, lager to lambic. He'll also discuss the science, technology and history behind some of his most popular beers and address bigger topics like beer's history and future. The four-course dinner starts with soup (spiced butternut squash bisque with chive crème fraîche) and continues with a salad and polenta course. That's followed by seared peppered New York strip sirloin topped with Sam Adams Boston Lager sauce and served with corn flan and grilled asparagus. Each dish is paired with a Sam Adams beer. Dessert, double chocolate soufflé cake with a melted ganache center, comes with a glass of Sam's Holiday Porter. Skyline Room, Science Park, Boston (617-589-0185). www.mos.org. 6:30–9:30 pm. $35.

Performing Arts: Make Me a Match

Charles Busch

You've never seen a version of Thornton Wilder's The Matchmaker like this before. First, it's a staged reading, in which performers act out a few of the scenes but mostly read the comedy from stools on a setless stage. Second, this reading adds a little twist to the tale: Dolly is portrayed by female impersonator Charles Busch, the playwright and star of Vampire Lesbians of Sodom, one of the longest-running off-Broadway plays in history. (Busch has also starred in the film versions of his plays Psycho Beach Party and Die Mommie Die!)

The farcical play, which was later adapted into the musical Hello, Dolly!, centers on matchmaker Dolly Levi, a Yonkers, N.Y., widow who has a knack for pairing up singles. When a wealthy man hires her to find him a wife, Dolly decides she wants him for herself. So she tries to trick him into proposing to her by setting up several silly scenarios, including matching him with another woman. Steven Maler, resident director at the Wang Center and artistic director of Commonwealth Shakespeare Company, directs. If you like what you hear, this series of play readings, titled American Voices, continues throughout the fall. Shubert Theatre, 270 Tremont St., Boston (617-482-9393). www.wangcenter.org. 7 pm. $10.

Books & Poetry: From Page to Screen

Having a novel optioned by a major movie studio would seem to be the stuff of every author's dreams—seeing their characters brought to life by Meryl Streep, Ben Kingsley or Reese Witherspoon, not to mention getting a colossal paycheck. Or is it a nightmare of fussy studio execs, gargantuan egos and dumbed-down story-telling? Get the straight dope when three of the Boston area's most successful authors, Susan Orlean (The Orchid Thief), Andre Dubus III (House of Sand and Fog), and Tom Perrotta (Election), discuss their novel-to-movie experiences at the Grub Street Writers event titled Adaptations, at the Coolidge Corner Theatre November 18. All three read from their original works and examine clips of the resulting films. Coolidge Corner Theatre, 290 Harvard St., Brookline (617-734-2501) www.coolidge.org. 7:30 pm. $10, $8 Grub Street and Coolidge members.

CityScope: Christmas Time in the City

It's that time of year again. Slowly but surely, Christmas movies and commercials flood the networks, invites for holiday parties arrive in the mail and peppermint lattes make their brief annual run at Starbucks. But if you're looking for an event to officially welcome the yuletide season, head to Faneuil Hall November 20. While old St. Nick makes his rounds in a horse-drawn carriage, members of Boston Ballet perform selections from the holiday classic The Nutcracker, and the Chatham Handbell Choir and Alleluia Bell Ringers literally ring in the holidays with performances scattered throughout the afternoon. Mayor Menino lightens things up at 5:30 pm when he flips the switch on more than 100,000 bulbs strung throughout the North and South Markets. Faneuil Hall Marketplace, Boston (617-523-1300). 12–5:30 pm. Free.

CityScope: Shake a Tail Feather

We know you hardly need an excuse to don your favorite '70s duds and break into the Hustle. But we'll give you some incentive anyway: Just in time for Thanksgiving, THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN, Star 93.7 and Wild Turkey are throwing the Jive Turkey party—a '70s-themed benefit for the Massachusetts Food Bank—at Hurricane O'Reilly's. DJs spin tunes from the decade of decadence all night long. So grab a dashiki and your grooviest platforms and bring the funk to the dance floor (and bring a nonperishable food item to donate too). 150 Canal St., Boston (617-722-0161). 8 pm. Free.

Stomping Grounds

Local athletes gather for a good cause.

You know what they say about guys with big feet, right? They're unbelievably adept at stomping grapes. That talent will be on full display November 18th at Maggiano's Little Italy for the I Love Music Foundation's first annual Famous Feet Celebrity Stomp.

Boston Celtics forward Walter McCarty, who established the foundation in 2002, will be joined at Maggiano's by some of his teammates plus members of the Patriots and Revolution, who will all get their feet wet for charity at the kick-off event for the new Maggiano's Wine Club. The night will also feature a silent auction of memorabilia from the sports and entertainment worlds.

"It's a great way to celebrate the harvest season and raise awareness for our charitable efforts," McCarty says. "I'm looking forward to rolling up my pant legs and stomping some grapes."

The $50 ticket price includes hors d'oeuvres, an open bar and a VIP gift bag, and all proceeds benefit the I Love Music Foundation, which provides access to musical instruction, instruments and equipment for disadvantaged children in Boston.

When Johnny Met Peter

Finding Neverland doesn't fly.

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Nothing against J.M. Barrie and Peter Pan, but isn't a celebration of Barrie's legendary play that presents it as the work that brought fantasy into pop culture cutting its own throat? Is laying the burden of today's pop culture—so much of which is targeted at 10-year-olds—really the best way to pay tribute to Barrie's ode to retaining childlike imagination and innocence? That's probably not the best tribute, but it's exactly the route Finding Neverland, a movie dramatizing the genesis of Barrie's play, takes. In this day and age, a story telling you to tap into your inner child, as Peter Pan does, is as common as dirt (and audiences certainly didn't find much special about last year's live-action Pan movie).

Johnny Depp tries to patch up Kate Winslet's family in Finding Neverland.

Finding Neverland concocts a sickly-sweet soap opera surrounding J.M. "James" Barrie (Johnny Depp), the Scottish-born playwright who has a big flop (Little Mary) and a dissatisfied wife (Radha Mitchell) on his hands as the story opens in 1903 London. This bit of Edwardian fluff finds Barrie and wife Mary already distant when he meets the young Davies brothers one afternoon at the local park where he sits and writes. The four boys are still grieving from the death of their father and have a tense relationship with loyal mother Sylvia Llewelyn Davies (Kate Winslet). The boys have lost trust in her, as her wishful assurances that their father would be all right turned out to be wrong.

Sensing the boys need to be cheered up, Barrie starts involving them in games of cowboys-and-Indians and pirate adventures. Soon he's spending more time with Sylvia and the boys than with his wife, much to the chagrin of Mary and of the boys' stern grandmother (Julie Christie). He especially takes time to encourage Peter (Freddie Highmore), who seems unable to grieve for his late father and whose emotional wound has dulled his boyish energy.

There's one moment in Finding Neverland when a Davies boy mentions how one of these pretend games leaves much to the imagination to fill in the gaps, and Barrie replies, "As it should be." But that's not a sentiment director Marc Forster adheres to, unfortunately. Finding Neverland could have easily been called The Attack of the Art Department, and that's a surprise from Forster, whose previous movies were the much rawer Everything Put Together (starring Mitchell) and the Billy Bob Thornton–Halle Berry drama Monster's Ball.

Instead of putting his faith in Barrie's resourcefulness to spin yarns for the boys, which Depp plays wonderfully, Forster trucks in overblown fantasy sequences that momentarily take the action to the circus, the Wild West and a pirate ship. Forster gilds the proverbial lily in these sequences and brings three wise words to mind: Less is more.

That advice might have helped with the melodrama too. When Sylvia gets a consumptive cough, Finding Neverland becomes a deathwatch movie, and a race for Barrie to finish his new play, with which he hopes to literally put the "play" back in the theater. Meanwhile, as American-born producer Charles Frohman (Dustin Hoffman) amusingly scoffs and the cast members scratch their heads (a dog suit? a pirate ship onstage?), Peter Pan takes shape, based on the boys and their game mom.

It all leads to an opening-night climax in which the drama of whether the boys will get to the theater (now mom's really sick) mixes with the saccharine ploy of Barrie reserving 25 tickets for orphans to sit in and break the ice for the stuffy adults, who are soon ooh-ing and aah-ing at the action as if they were 6-year-olds. This zealous climax gave me the creeps and came off like a cheesy, greeting-card version of the truly moving sequence in Preston Sturges' sharp 1940s comedy Sullivan's Travels, in which a group of worn-down chain-gang convicts have their spirits lifted by a Mickey Mouse cartoon.

But the only real lift Finding Neverland provides is Johnny Depp's performance. Nailing Barrie's Scottish accent, Depp also gives him a pent-up imagination that bursts loose when the Davies boys show up, as well as a sadness about his failing marriage. It's hard to imagine anyone else giving this role as rousing a performance as Depp does; still, his movie never made me want to clap my hands in approving belief. IB

Finding Neverland ★★½

Directed by Marc Forster. Written by David Magee. With Johnny Depp, Kate Winslet, Radha Mitchell, Julie Christie, Freddie Highmore and Dustin Hoffman. Rated R. At Boston Common.

Birth ★★★
In the end the story doesn't really amount to a hill of beans, but for most of the way, Sexy Beast director Jonathan Glazer's latest is a spellbinding little psychological thriller. The premise—a 10-year-old boy (Cameron Bright) appears at the door of a well-to-do New York woman (Nicole Kidman) and tells her that he's her husband, who died a decade before—sounds ridiculous, yet it's played for real and comes across surprisingly well. The characters act as you imagine they really would. The woman doubts the boy is the reincarnated husband at first, but when he knows intimate details about her life, she starts to believe him and become infatuated with him. Much of the awkwardness comes late in the movie, when it has to either prove or disprove the boy's claims, and the story doesn't quite wriggle out of its predicament unscathed. Even so, as a Donnie Darko–like metaphysical wrinkle in time and space, this is an intriguing oddity. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Dig ★★★
Ondi Timoner's documentary about the up-and-down relationship between the bands the Dandy Warhols and the Brian Jonestown Massacre is at its most interesting when it touches upon the battle between creativity and commerce. Each band has to decide how much it's willing to compromise to get its music heard, and for a time the bands were cohorts in fighting the system. As the relationship between sensible Dandy Warhols leader Courtney Taylor and self-destructive Brian Jonestown Massacre leader Anton Newcombe becomes more contentious, the bands actually become less interesting, despite the supposed drama, and so does the movie. (Midnight shows at Coolidge Corner, Nov. 26 and 27.)

End of the Century: The Story of the Ramones ★★★
After years in the works, Jim Fields and Michael Grimaglia's outstanding documentary on the prototypical punk band is finally here. The movie celebrates the fast, loud, darkly humorous three-chord rock of the Queens punks by charting the Ramones' rise in its first half. Then it peers into the unhappy offstage relationships that made much of the band's 22 years miserable for its members. Mainly, the feud between shy liberal Joey and hard-nosed conservative Johnny—sent to extremes when Joey's girlfriend left him for Johnny, whom she then married—is the source of the most discontent. Although the movie includes frank interviews from Johnny—the leader who took a "soldier on," all-business attitude to the band's commercial struggle—and colorful Dee Dee, its main flaw is that it never broaches such emotional topics with Joey. But now that all three are dead, this is the best we'll ever get. (Midnight shows at Coolidge Corner, November 19 and 20.)

I [heart] Huckabees ★★★
Writer-director David O. Russell's world is a chaotic one in which he amusingly forces characters to face up to their place in it, sometimes willingly, sometimes not. In Russell's latest film, troubled activist Albert (Jason Schwartzman) is somewhat willing, but he's not prepared to be pulled into the rabbit hole by the existential detectives (Lily Tomlin, Dustin Hoffman) he hires to find meaning in his life. The duo drags Albert into the lives of his nemesis (Jude Law)—a junior executive trying to turn Albert's environmental group into a PR-friendly front for his chainstore—and a fellow client (Mark Wahlberg) obsessed with petroleum consumption. The movie ricochets around like a pinball, sometimes distractingly so, but just about every direction it heads in is hilarious. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Harvard Square and suburbs.)

Kinsey ★★★
Scientist Alfred Kinsey became obsessed with researching the sexual habits of Americans and having his scientific findings replace myth and traditional morality in shaping people's view of "average" sexual behavior. Bill (Gods and Monsters) Condon's period piece does a fascinating job of capturing the fervent work of Kinsey (Liam Neeson) and showing how his findings of the 1940s and 1950s shook up the public and put the powers-that-be on high alert. Neeson's performance recalls the fixation of his Oskar Schindler, with getting as many people's sex history on paper the goal this time, while Laura Linney, Peter Sarsgaard, John Lithgow and Oliver Platt fill out the deep cast. The intensity of this rise-and-fall story starts to peter out, though, when it gets to the third act, thanks to vagueness in chronology and the sense that many events are being rushed through and oversimplified, right down to the rather mystifyingly upbeat ending. (At Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Overnight ★★★
Is this the greatest Hollywood cautionary tale of all-time or hogwash with a hidden agenda? Probably a little of both, but it's enough of the first to make your jaw drop. You might remember Troy Duffy, the New Hampshire native who seemed to have struck it big in 1997 when Miramax snapped up his first screenplay, signed Duffy to direct it, signed his band to do the soundtrack and even agreed to buy the West Hollywood bar where he tended bar for him. Ultimately, Miramax decided not to make the movie or buy the bar, and the band's record contract fell through. When Duffy finally did make Boondock Saints, it played in a grand total of five theaters, and when the band finally released an album, it was even more of a flop. This documentary shows that a lot of the reason people didn't want to work with Duffy, when all was said and done, was Duffy himself, who generally acted as if he could do everyone's job better than they could, and let them know it. Two of the people he let know were Tony Montana and Mark Brian Smith, who were co-managing the band as well as making a documentary about Duffy's sudden success. They stopped managing the band but kept making the documentary, and they certainly have reason to make Duffy look bad. But Duffy does plenty of that himself, to the point that his brother, also in the band, splits with him. It's a chilling tale of hubris run amok, yet the ending might not be as dismal as that suggests. The Internet Movie Database shows that a sequel to the Tarantino-esque Boondock Saints, which did well on video, is in production, with the estranged brother listed as Duffy's co-writer. So this story isn't over. (Opens Nov. 26 at Kendall Square.)

Ray ★★★
Jamie Foxx's monumental performance dominates this fairly conventional biopic in which a talented hero (R&B/pop pioneer Ray Charles) overcomes adverse circumstances (witnessing his brother's drowning, going blind at age 7) and inner demons (a heroin habit, infidelity) to become a beloved American institution. Sometimes director Taylor Hackford's Hollywood treatment stretches credibility, particularly when the movie contrives to have Charles concoct the classic "What'd I Say?" as an impromptu time filler onstage one night. And the movie might be too forgiving of the pain Charles caused his wife. But Foxx is so immersed in the role, giving Charles a sly charisma, and the musical moments (with Foxx lip-synching to Charles' recordings) are so good that the movie's life-affirming intentions win out. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Shall We Dance? ★★
It's hard to think of an American remake of a foreign film that's as faithful to the original as this tale of a businessman whose drab life turns upbeat when he starts secretly taking ballroom-dancing lessons. But while the 1996 Japanese original was a charmer that won you over, the American remake gets the slick Hollywood treatment, and all that that cliché suggests: Stars Richard Gere, Susan Sarandon and Jennifer Lopez don't always have the everyday quality required of their characters; the American gregariousness smothers the Japanese reserve that was a hallmark of the original; and the remake awkwardly overreaches at times, especially in the over-the-top climax set to the cringe-worthy Peter Gabriel song "Book of Love." (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Sideways ★★★
Alexander Payne's Sideways does for the approach of middle age what his About Schmidt did for the onset of old age: uses it as a springboard for bittersweet comedy and a road trip. At first, this makes the latest from the director of Citizen Ruth and Election a letdown. But Payne and writing partner Jim Taylor's riffs on male bonding make this story of two 40-ish buddies' trip to California wine country painfully funny. It's hard to say where the characters leave off and the actors begin in the hilarious little moments in which the pair goes to wineries to sample the latest vintages. Paul Giamatti (American Splendor), who could be amusing reading a shopping list, gives a colorful tilt to wine connoisseur Miles' picky assessments of his tastings; in Giamatti's hands, sometimes Miles is being intentionally funny, sometimes not. Meanwhile, Thomas Haden Church's Jack has an endearing dumb-jock quality, and his response to Miles' "knowledgeable" wine talk is usually "tastes pretty good to me." Each man's approach to wine mirrors his approach to life and to the women they meet, of course, with Jack blindly leaping in and Miles analyzing and analyzing. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

Tarnation ★★★½
In a year of too many remakes, sequels and "same old, same old" movies, Jonathan Caouette's distinctive documentary stands out. Culled from 20 years of the home movies he's shot since he was a boy, it tells the unforgettable, tragedy-laced story of his family, and of his relationship with his mother Renee, who was subjected to numerous sessions of questionable electro-shock therapy as a teenager. It's a cycle of madness that Caouette's grandparents foisted on his mom, and that he has continued to try to fight off. Almost as remarkable as the family history is the way Caouette tells the personal story, in a fast-moving collage of home movies punctuated by deadpan, onscreen text. Few movies this year have been as compellingly involving. (At Coolidge Corner.)

Team America: World Police ★★★½
Trey Parker and Matt Stone's return to the big screen is much, much funnier than its so-so trailer. Some have called the South Park creators' puppet-animated comedy politically impotent, since it makes fun of both the right and the left, but it's much more a pop culture satire than a political satire. Its story of a team of terrorist-fighting Americans is most of all a priceless spoof of ego-thumping Hollywood action movies. The title characters carelessly destroy other countries' national treasures (the Eiffel Tower, the Sphinx, etc.) on the way to protecting American security because, as in most pumped-up Hollywood action pictures, other countries just aren't as important as we are. (The parody of the clichéd disrespect that action movies show Arabs and other ethnicities is a hoot.) Of course, the similarity between the swaggering American self-image parodied here and our government's behavior is in the eye of the beholder. Meanwhile, Korean dictator Kim Jong Il is the WMD-distributing bad guy, a cross between Elmer Fudd and Blofeld, while Team America's domestic nemeses are Hollywood lefties including Alec Baldwin, Tim Robbins and Michael Moore. Sure, it's childish to make fun of celebrities who've spoken out against the war in Iraq, but it's childish to have a puppet puking for a minute and a half, yet that's also the funniest movie scene all year. And, as in the South Park movie, Trey Parker's song parodies just can't be beat. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Vera Drake ★★
The latest from Mike Leigh (Secrets & Lies, Topsy-Turvy) starts as one of his most involving recent movies, as we meet his title character, played by solid Imelda Staunton. She's an industrious, generous housekeeper in 1950s England who works hard, never complains and also happens to "help young girls out" by performing abortions. She's simply a fascinating person to watch, until halfway through the movie. That's when she gets arrested after one of the girls nearly dies, and the legal procedures and family complications she suffers turn the story utterly predictable. Instead of being involving, the action just becomes a long-winded exercise in contrasting Vera's treatment with that of a young rich woman (Sally Hawkins) who, in a too-short subplot, gets an abortion through doctors who'll skirt the law for a price Vera's lower-class patients could never pay. (At Copley, Harvard Square and West Newton.)

What the Bleep Do We Know? ★★

It's different, all right, but that's not always a good thing in this indie, new-agey blend of documentary and drama. The documentary has some generally interesting scientific theorizing about the way the body perceives the world and about the effect of emotion on cells. But the interesting stuff is married to goofy animation and, even worse and even goofier, dramatic sequences starring Marlee Matlin as a two-timed photographer who undergoes an attitude adjustment. These scenes are as clunky as an airline safety video. (At Copley Place and Waltham Embassy.)

The World's Best Rum Has Reached Boston!

Ron Zacapa Centenario – A Rum Without Peer

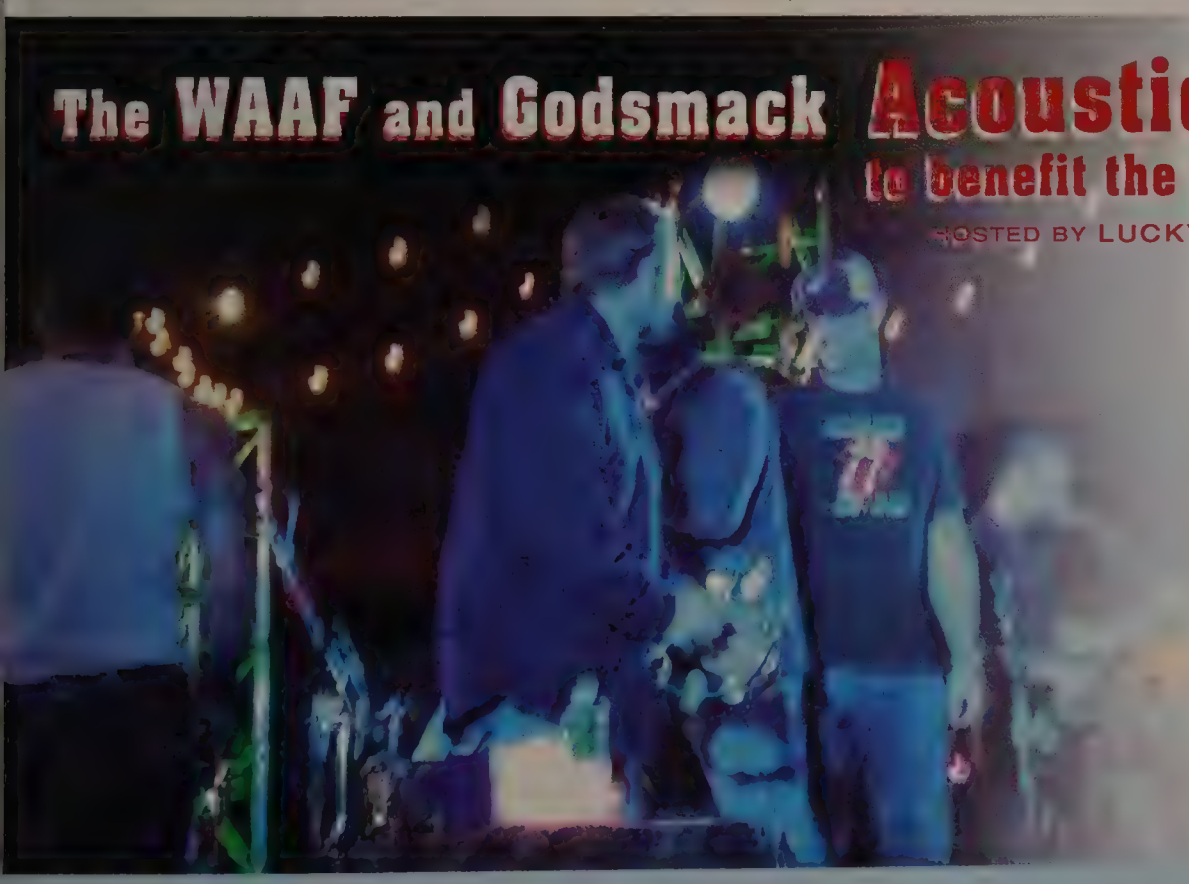
Ron Zacapa Centenario, from the small Guatemalan town of Zacapaneca, is often regarded as the world's finest rum. Part of the secret lies in the cool-climate aging; by storing the rum in bodegas 8,000 feet above sea level, the spirit is able to age slowly and gracefully for 23 years, much longer than other fine sipping rums. Pick up a bottle of Centenario, grasp the unique palm leaf wrapper woven by local artisans, and you immediately sense this is a rum without peer.

Zacapa Mojito
2 oz. Ron Zacapa Centenario
Juice of two limes
2 tbs. superfine granulated sugar
Splash club soda
5-10 mint leaves

Combine ingredients in a cocktail shaker with ice. Shake and strain into an ice-filled glass. Top with a splash of club soda and garnish with a sprig of mint.

Honey Martini
Created by Christopher (Stretch) Gerdon, China Grill, Miami
2 1/2 oz. Zacapa Centenario
1 oz. of diluted Honey
Squeeze 1/2 Lemon
Splash of Soda Water

Shake juice and ingredients together with ice, and strain into martini glass. Add splash of soda and garnish with lime wheel.



Tamarind Rum Punch
(Created by Chuck Simeone, Spice Market, NYC)
1 1/2 oz. Ron Zacapa Centenario
2 1/2 oz. tamarind nectar

Shake all ingredients with ice and strain into an ice-filled highball glass. Garnish with a cocktail straw.

The Only Rum To Receive 4 Consecutive Gold Medals at The Rum Fesitval of Barbados 1998,1999,2000,2001

Madeleine Peyroux returns to share sweet transformations in song.

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Preconceptions are lost when one hears Madeleine Peyroux's sweet, lingering alto inhabit the lyrics of a tune like Bob Dylan's "You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go," one of several exquisite covers on her new CD, Careless Love.

One preconception that listeners might find hard to dispel, however, is Peyroux's eerie similarity in tone and phrasing to jazz icon Billie Holiday, who left a huge impression on the singer during her teens.

"For me, Billie Holiday created a technique that gave insight into the performance and, consequently, into the meaning of the performance," says the pop-jazz singer (whose last name is pronounced pe-RU, like the country). "That's probably why I could never shake [that influence]. Why would you want to? But there you go. It's a catch-22."

Pop-jazz vocalist Madeleine Peyroux learned her craft on the streets of Paris.

"It's only a frustration when I get the impression that I haven't gotten across to the audience, like when I get a reviewer who says it was derivative to the point that the performance was distracting," Peyroux says from her Brooklyn home. "But if that's his experience, that's a big part of it. My best hope is that because this is such an organic process, I can keep on kicking and growing."

Smart listeners will take the same journey beyond initial perceptions, or they'll miss out on some extraordinarily deft music. Bostonians get the chance to see Peyroux perform with her quartet at John Hancock Hall November 26 (for free admission, with a donation of food for charity) to cap the hall's two-week Equinox Music Festival.

In 1996, before the pop breakthroughs of Norah Jones and Diana Krall, Peyroux sold 200,000 copies of her startling debut, Dreamland, which Time magazine called "the most exciting, involving vocal performance by a new singer this year." But after that first album, which she recorded at age 22, Peyroux disappeared from the radar for eight years.

"Until you've been in the public eye, it doesn't mean as much not to be," says Peyroux, 31, who tried twice to deliver a second CD before developing a cyst on her vocal cords. During the intervening years, she spent time with church and family, and even did some waitressing. "It can appear that things are not going well when, in fact, things are just incubating.

"One of the interesting things was playing in a café in Nashville for two or three months, just five nights a week by myself," she says. "When I was trying to be a waitress and it didn't work out, I actually jumped in with both feet and got this job. Occasionally I'd go out and play on the street again, and was booking myself in various clubs."

Peyroux knew how to be a street musician. Born in Georgia, but raised in Paris by her mother, a French teacher, she learned her craft on the boulevards of the Old World.

"The streets themselves had the energy—it almost felt as if you were just there to pick up on it," she says. "A lot of what we were able to do was reliant on how much [people] were willing to pay, so it had something to do with the fact that it was a tourist neighborhood. But the spirit of the Latin Quarter was also full of this artistic attitude.

"I was capable of honing my skills in this really rich environment," adds Peyroux, who sings one song in seamless French on the new disc. "People that I knew on the street were like characters out of a comic book, and nobody really did anybody any harm... I don't remember major tragedies other than that a lot of my friends died young from alcoholism.

"Besides the fact that we had this safe world to live in, we were able to communicate with an audience in a musical format that was just as adventurous, that was something you could learn from, because jazz is so many layers deep," she says. "I think that's why I'm still doing it now."

After quietly rebuilding a presence through club dates in the U.S. and abroad, Peyroux signed with Rounder Records. She recorded Careless Love in Los Angeles with producer Larry Klein, known for his work with ex-wife Joni Mitchell. Klein helped assemble a cast of facile players anchored by keyboardist Larry Goldings, and co-wrote the breezy "Don't Wait Too Long" with Peyroux and Jesse Harris, who lent similar assistance on Norah Jones' blockbuster Come Away with Me.

"I met Jesse Harris right about the time I was getting off tour in 1997, and the following year was when Norah moved to New York," Peyroux says. "I remember her seeing me off. I feel like everything is really following its own path. I'm just raring to go. I think it's just the beginning." IB

Dueling piano players sit opposite each other at grand pianos in a high-energy, infectious show. Group interaction and song requests keep the audience involved with every exciting beat. As The Boston Globe has written, "If you don't have fun at Jake Ivory's, it's your own damn fault!" Featuring a full bar, 24-ounce beers, two regulation size billiards tables, and several large televisions, Jake's is THE place for families, friends, and colleagues to mix cocktails and fun!

Bill's Bar is one stop shopping for all your entertainment needs. Whether you seek rock-n-roll bands, a DJ spinning hip-hop and top-40, the live island dub beats of a reggae band, karaoke, sports viewing on large-screen TVs, or late-night dancing, Bill's has it all. With its cold beer and comfortable booths, it's no-frills, no-fuss, and simultaneously high-energy and laidback... all with a musical twist. Bill's... it's fun without pretense.

Tiki Room offers the Boston area a unique taste of the tropics. With its outdoor patio seating, build-your own pupu platters, 60-ounce scorpion bowls, and festive atmosphere, the Tiki Room is the perfect panacea for your party planning woes. Perfect for a group to gather and share cheer, Tiki has been featured everywhere from The Boston Globe to The Phantom Gourmet, and is renowned for immortalizing good rum and turning drinking into an art. Call us to make your next get-together tiki-rific! It's just what the witch doctor ordered!

Mystery Red Sox Fan

It was October 29, two days after our beloved Red Sox won the World Series. I was on a mission to buy Sox memorabilia at the Souvenir Store on Yawkey Way. You were with a buddy visiting from San Francisco standing behind me in line. You have brown hair, blue eyes and were wearing tan cords with a Sox cap…not to mention a smile that melted my heart! I was the girl in front of you wearing jeans and a Burberry poncho. We shared idle chit-chat until our wait was up, and went our separate ways once we got into the store. You did, however, tap me on the back to say goodbye when you were leaving. I will never forgive myself for not asking you your name. Am I crazy—are we just two ships passing? If the odds are in my favor that you read this, I would love to hear from you and complete our introduction in more comfortable surroundings.

Ballerina at the Harp

I met you at the bar downstairs at the Harp on October 30. We were there for the BostonYPA 2nd Annual Mayhem and Madness: Halloween party. You were simply beautiful as a ballerina. I remember I asked you to pirouette, you know, that twirl thing that ballerinas do? You did it and giggled with a lovely smile. We talked about where we were from; you recently moved to Boston from Medfield. You said you work for a brokerage firm and are 23 years old. Oh and the music was loud, but I believe your name is Kristin. You ordered a Molson Light and paid using your credit card. I was wearing a black jacket, black jeans, Red Sox cap (with a "B" in front). (Note: I had a Scary Movie mask on, but took it off to drink a beer. Plus it was HOT down there!) I danced with a few women that night and even got a kiss or two, but you stood out over all of them. I wanted to get your number and ask you out for dinner and a movie, but I was hoping to run into you on the dance floor (but didn't). You simply disappeared like one of those ghost stories you hear about (you know, the ones where a guy sees a woman on the side of the road then takes her to his prom then she asks him to drive her to the nearest cemetery where she disappears. Creepy, yet romantic! Let me know if you were interested.

I Thought It Was Over

When I first witnessed a "Yankees Suck" chant at Fenway I was confused to say the least...the Red Sox were not playing the Yankees. There were no pinstripes to be found. I understand the competition. I understand the rivalry. I even at times understand the hatred. But when there are 3.2 million members of Red Sox nation celebrating at the rolling rally and the Yankees Suck chant starts, I am as confused as ever. It sounds as if it is coming out of the mouths of a group of second-place also-rans, not the home of the World Series Champions. So ENOUGH please...let's let this one die with the Curse.
—Yankees Suck sucks

Shy Guy

Blame it on being a shy guy, but I should have asked for your number. We walked together from Cambridge to Canal Street before Game 1 of the World Series. You are new in town from Dallas and asked me for directions to Marquee—I was on my way to Beer Works to watch the game, so we walked together. We joked about how much of a great walking city Boston is and how lazy some people are to take cabs everywhere. I was too much of a gentleman to ask for your number even though I wanted to. I would love to continue our conversation.

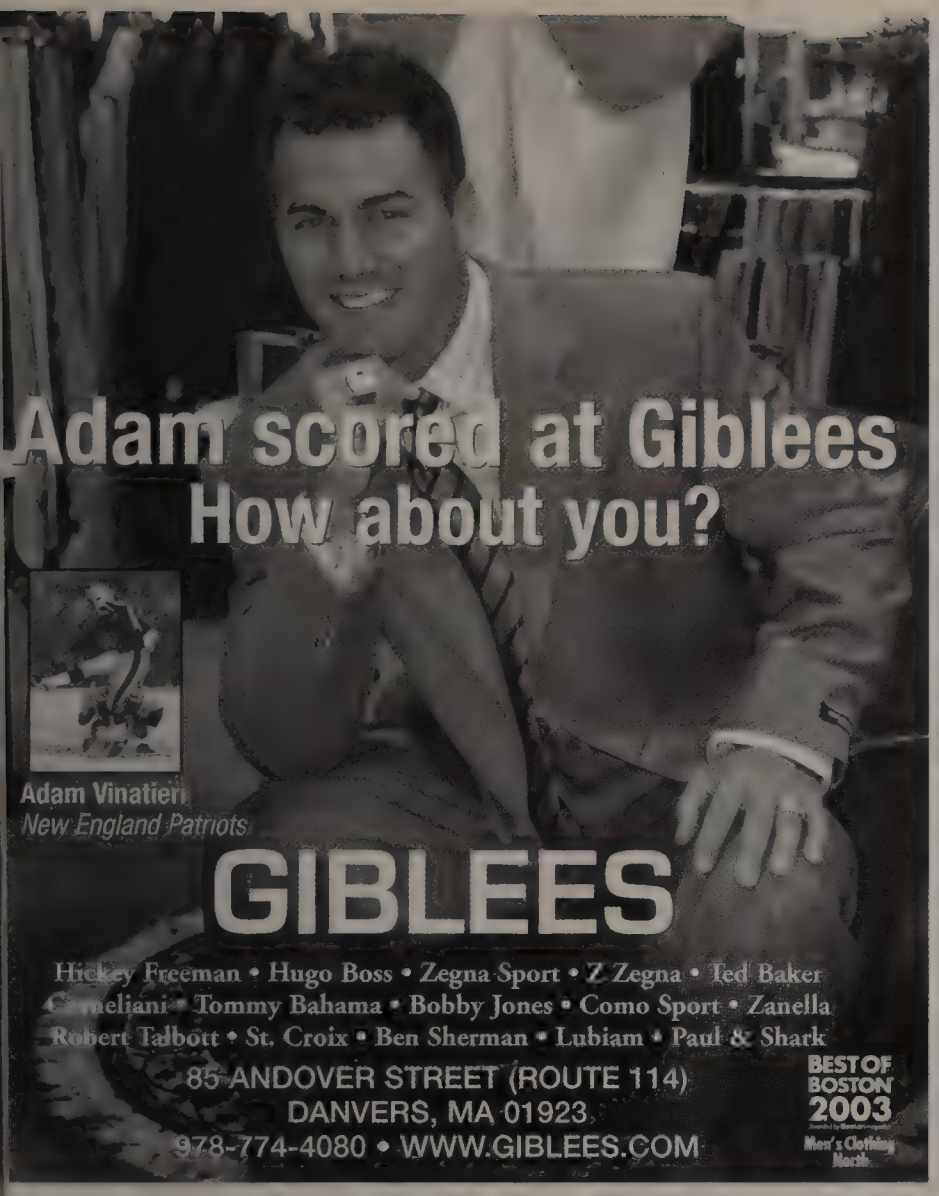
Beacon Hill Friday Nights



About dealing with each other's noise: We should all do our share of being considerate for others—it's a part of living in the city. Some of those Friday nights or Tuesday afternoons, or any odd time could be sleep time for shift workers, or peace time for someone else. Being a busy area for medical facilities, one should realize that any extra noise at any time could disturb a sleeper before their night shift. That nurse or doctor or someone else could be the one that needs to care for your loved ones, or even yourself... Wouldn't it be nice to know that the person caring for you wasn't disturbed by your noise, and had a good sleep before coming to work? You shouldn't have to wait for a neighbor to let you know when enough is enough. Just be responsible!

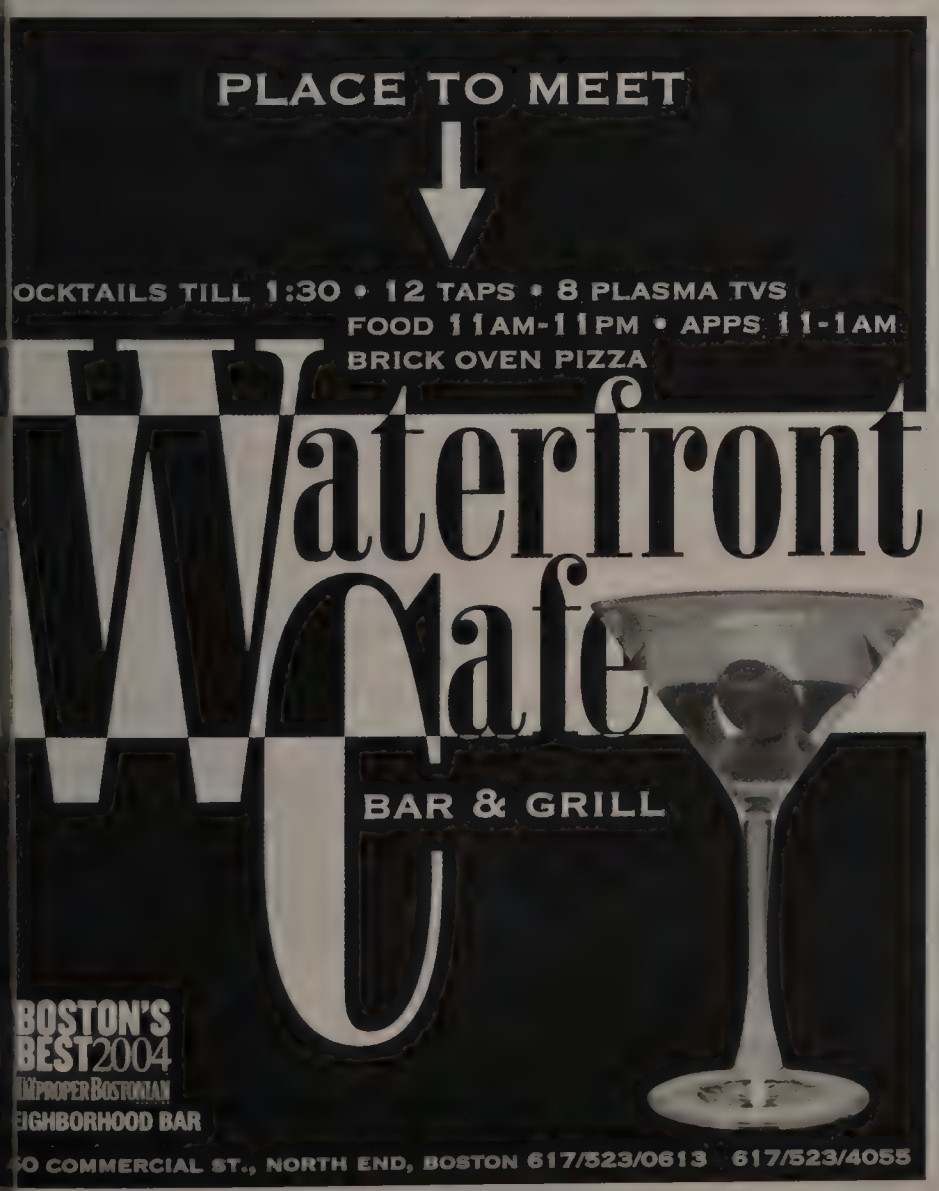
Crossword Puzzle Fanatic



So it was the evening the Sox won it all, around 5 pm, Green Line leaving Government Center. You were sitting to my left, I was standing (actually hovering) as you were working on your Globe crossword puzzle. You said you liked the Globe because it gets easier the more you do. You were whizzing through it. I think I was able to help decipher 36 down: "what an ump calls." I mentioned "walk," and we helped each other with the remainder until my stop. Actually, you did it all. I suck at crosswords. I was trying to mutter something to say, but nothing would come out. I forget what I was wearing then, I can only remember you. Your wavy, brown short hair was so beautiful and you seemed so sophisticated and enthralled with your swatting of the crosswords. You were wearing a sweater of sorts. That color between purple and red, not sure how to describe it. When I left, I told you good luck, the only pathetic thing that I could say at the time, our eyes met outside the train, and now I find myself looking for you evenings at the Green Line in Government Center. With all the coffee shops in this joint, maybe I could see you again and learn some more basic vocabulary.

Dear Mommy

Thank you for pulling ticks off me and combing my coat all the time. And for clipping my nails and putting olive oil on my kibble and taking me to the Fells to run and swim. Thank you for not cutting off my balls. Thank you for spending so much time with me and protecting me from daddy, especially when he drinks beer. Thank you for letting me lick your feet in the morning and for kicking daddy out of bed to walk me at 6 am in sub-zero weather. Thanks for the rawhide, the bones, the stuffed-toys, the squeaky toys and all the other crap. Thanks for the lobster, the chicken, the steak, the scrambled eggs, the sugar cereal, the cannolis and all the other stuff you aren't supposed to feed me. Thanks for giving me my own TV chair and for generally letting me do whatever the hell I want. You're the best. Love,
—Hillman

rockie horoscope

SCORPIO OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

The scene at home, especially between the spacier members of the family, may continue to mystify you. But that situation can, if the occasion arises, improve, or it can degenerate into pure chaos. Don't let it take center stage. Better to focus on yourself, the way you look and how you come across. Magnetic Venus will enter Scorpio on the 22nd, making your charms fairly irresistible. Figure out what you want to do with this gift because it'll only work its magic until December 16; after that, you're on your own.

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Hook up with a Virgo, perhaps even a Gemini, who is as willing as you are to make a significant adjustment in your daily routines. You both have itchy feet and a desire to discover "the real you." It may take another month, until the Sagittarius sun merges with transformational Pluto, before you make your move, but you can use the time to plan ahead. Mercury in your sign helps to sort through the details, which, because Mercury turns retrograde on the 30th, may have to be revised. Twice.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

If it's been rocky for you lately, then you'll be relieved around the 18th when the life-giving sun lends its support to your Saturn ruler. Even if nothing notable happens, your mood can lift considerably. However—and there always seems to be one of those—sweet smiles can turn into frowns the very next day when artistic, affectionate Venus denies whatever it is Saturn (and by association, you) wants. Their square aspect is cold; it's the kind of challenge that primarily excites artists and their dealers.

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

While the rest of us are preparing for a successful (as in enjoyable) holiday season, Aquarians, like Dick Cheney, may be focusing on a success that is more in line with public recognition. The new moon in your power-obsessed Scorpio midheaven introduced a month-long cycle of ambitious intentions that only you know about. However, this cycle could take a full year, not a mere month, before coming full circle. Merchants might envision dollar signs; the military, a reversal of fortune; couples, an intriguing love life.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

Faraway places with strange-sounding names can seem very attractive right about now. How far from home can you travel and still maintain an attachment to the personal changes you're going through? But after so many years, you might be immune to the call of the wild you hear whenever Sagittarius approaches. Whether you investigate the possibility of exploring unknown terrain or decide to check out the exotic and erotic potential of the neighborhood is a dilemma the dualist Fish faces every holiday season.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Feeling frisky? Willing to risk making a significant change? The astrological auspices support following your gut instinct, at least until Thanksgiving. Then repercussions from the holiday feast may arise and upset future plans. Although you think you can count on other people's money, because Mercury is turning retrograde as the month ends, you can't be certain you have the correct information. That's also the time that your Mars ruler falls under the spell of delusional Neptune. Keep the faith, but don't neglect to read the small print.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

Thanks to that new moon in Scorpio, partnership concerns over the next three weeks might matter more than ever. Your desire could easily lead to dirty tricks, but you'll soon be as subtly manipulative as your mate. After your Venus ruler enters Scorpio on the 20th, pulling the rug out from under or doing an about-face may seem the appropriate, even the natural thing to do. Your reasoning seems justifiable, especially if you grow frustrated by an adamant attitude at home or an overly anxious relative.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

If you start your holiday shopping early—say, around the 18th—you'll have an uncanny eye for a bargain and an ear finely tuned to the hints being dropped. Right now, you're in an excellent position for uncovering the truth, the nitty-gritty of an unpleasant situation that begs to be revealed. Because your detail-driven Mercury ruler will cover the same ground for the next two months, make sure you aren't cocksure of your facts—and that you see the full extent of the forest and the importance of the different trees.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Since a Moon Child is more sensitive than other signs to the potential of each new-moon period, take time to check out the romantic possibilities introduced by the recent Scorpio lunation (even the ones that exist only in your head). Don't pick up on the first come-on you get; keep your options open and follow through as it suits your own schedule, not anybody else's. By Thanksgiving, you'll have made a connection you can play with, perhaps work with as well. Truly creative fun and games lie ahead.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Home and hearth are the main focus of this lunar cycle, so if you're already obsessing about decorating and entertaining, go with the impulse. For some reason—probably sensible Saturn's steady hand on your sun ruler's love of luxury—you won't go overboard this season. However, you could throw both tradition and caution to the wind and come up with a brilliant idea for a one-of-a-kind Thanksgiving celebration. Keep those plans fairly flexible, just in case erratic Uranus plays havoc with the entire holiday weekend.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

If you're feeling antsier than usual, ready to jump ship or take to the road, blame your Mercury ruler in footloose, but not totally fancy-free Sagittarius. It won't help quiet your nerves if a partner is also eager and willing to break with tradition. See who's carrying the heavier obligation and try to manage it gracefully. Then, when Mercury turns retrograde on the 30th, you'll have room to maneuver, change your mind or do preliminary research on an assignment that you promise you won't assume until next year.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Maybe the decision will be too tough to make; maybe your ego will get in the way. However, while your amenable Venus ruler and stern Saturn form a challenging square, you'll be aware that as a mere plaything of the gods you are being sorely tested. Whether you pass or fail depends in part on how well you fit the image the rest of the family wants to project. Career matters could take a similar turn as pressure from above is brought to bear on you personally instead of on your contribution to a group effort. Come turkey time, it'll all be history.

IMPROPER sightings

UNLIKE THE REST OF YOUR FRIENDS, WE WANT TO SEE THE PHOTOS FROM YOUR NEXT TRIP.

Where do you take us? Send us a picture of you or a friend, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed Improper Sightings.

Lacey Holcomb represents Boston at the Upper Crust in Key West, Fla. Key West is just like Boston except for the weather and all the naked people.

Captain F. John Nicoll skippers his ship, the Horizon Expedition, under San Francisco's Golden Gate Bridge. Even though it's foggy, he's still happy. He's a chipper skipper.

Erika Clark and Scott McDonald heeded the sign that reads "Tipping is not a city in China" at Charlie's Bar in Aruba. However, Taiping is a city in Taiwan, where tipping is not customary. Carry on.

Dan Reichgott and Rachel Glaser stopped by the Western Wall and the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem, Israel, on their way to Fenway. They say you can't get into the Dome of the Rock on game day without tickets.

John Garrity, Laurie Shemansky, Justin Grant, Kristin Garrity and Shayne Holland cheer for some kind of animal called a "gos ox" at a baseball game in Baltimore.

Mike Mackey visited the Red Sox' dugout during the World Series. He pinch-ran to the bathroom for Manny.

THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN

LAST SCENE HERE

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

At the BSO Inaugural Gala, top: Keith Lockhart. Bottom row: Gideon Lester; James Levine; Kim and James Taylor.

AUSPICIOUS BEGINNINGS...

"Historic" and "monumental" were just two of the hyperbolic but apropos words that were being bandied about at the BSO's Inaugural Gala, which this year marked the debut of maestro James Levine, who takes over as the 14th music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Levine's legion of tooters, strummers and bangers ushered in the new era with a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 8.

Seen crowding into Symphony Hall were such prominent socialites and music mavens as major benefactors Leo and Gabriella Beranek; über-philanthropists Ray and Maria Stata and John and Diddy Cullinane; bigtime arts patrons Mark and Joyce Goldweitz; Cambridge writer (and Ann Landers offspring) Margo Howard and the dashing Ron Weintraub; blonde bombshell Joanne Dickinson; Back Bay party pair Bert and Rosalie Cohen; incorrigible scamp Gideon Lester of the American Repertory Theatre; mustachioed muchacho Avram Goldberg and the delightful Carol; conductor/hepcat Keith Lockhart; 'BUR bigwig Peter Fiedler; enduring pop icon James Taylor with his stunning wife, Kim (sporting a dazzling necklace he gave her); silver fox Pamela Humphrey; ex-senatorial spouse Joan Bennett Kennedy; TV's answer to Cary Grant, Frank Avruch, with his beloved Bette; blue-blooded bohemian Linda Cabot Black; North Shore grande dame Helen Spaulding; velvet-voiced radio personality Ron Della Chiesa and the fabulous Joyce, and just about everybody else you might care to mention.

The concert was followed by a standing ovation that probably belongs in the Guinness Book of World Records, which, in turn, was followed by a benefactors dinner worthy of Escoffier, held at the Fairmont Copley Plaza.

All in all, it was a spiffy start to the symphony season and Levine's tenure in Boston. As board chair emeritus Peter Brooke put it, with characteristic understatement: "Jim, I think you're getting a really great band."

THEY SHOULD OFFER A DEGREE IN PARTY PLANNING...

Most black-tie fund-raisers aren't worth the hassle of fumbling to get the cufflinks and studs into your tuxedo shirt, which is why the party at Mass Art to open the Elizabeth and Robert Pozen Center for Interrelated Media was such a refreshing change of pace.

The evening began with guests gathered in a gallery where mice in acrylic versions of a piano, cello, harp and assorted other instruments ran around, creating the eery yet atmospheric background music for the cocktail hour.

"I'd love to own some of the artist's work," said one collector, "but I'm not sure I'm ready for art that needs to be fed or cleaned up after."

Dinner, meanwhile, was accompanied by some intriguing video and performance art, and was followed by an eye-popping fashion show and a salsa performance that kept everyone transfixed.

In addition to the Pozens, the crowd included arts patrons Cecile and Fraser Lemley; style setter Meryl Bralower; PR powerhouse Sally Jackson; publishing poobah Nader Darehshori; charming Chestnut Hillions Lynn and Bruce Dayton; MFA curator Frederick Ilchman; fashionista Caroline Collings and her car and plane collector husband, Bob; art dealer Pat Stavaridis; dashing financial titan John Hamill and the lovely Kathryn; venture capitalist Sheryl Marshall and her art collector husband, Howard Salwen; and one woman who uncharitably observed, "There's enough Botox in this room to freeze all of Baghdad."

As if that weren't entertainment enough, everyone was invited outside afterward to the courtyard, where members of the school's iron guild were pouring molten metal into molds.

"All this creativity is exhausting," said one guest, "but it does distract from the fact that my feet hurt like hell in these shoes."

At the Mass Art party, top row: musical mice; artists pour the iron. Bottom: the fashion show; Caroline Collings and Trevania Henderson.

AGING GRACEFULLY...

Forget the fact that most of them are well into or rapidly approaching their forties—Young Friends of the Public Garden simply sounds better than Middle-Aged Friends of the Public Garden, and they still know how to party like rock stars (albeit rock stars with baby-sitters waiting for them at home and a slightly diminished capacity to bounce back after a night of imbibing Champagne).

All of which is to say that the Friends' annual Swing into Fall gala, held, as usual, at the Four Seasons, was an elegant and lively affair, with women in stunning designer gowns and men behaving like gentlemen.

Among them: besotted new parents Karyn and Kevin Lamb (one of the organization's founders and the evening's honoree); bright young things Lisa and Alex Pierpont; recent returnees from Paris Andrew and Maud Cabot; Venezuelan playboys Ricardo and Raphael Jaimes-Branger; banking babe Dyan Goodwin; design duo Peter and Emily Webster; Back Bay fun couple Courtney and Michael Forrester; yummy mummy Meg Gordon and her sidekick for the night, Suzanne Daley; plastic surgeon to the incrowd Ramsey Alsaraff; statuesque stunner Hollis Colby; super-glamorous couple Kim and Pel Stockwell; and one person who asked a tanned-looking friend with a house in Palm Beach whether she'd just been to Florida, to which she replied: "No, I've just been in my makeup bag."

By the time dinner was over and the dancing began, those of us who are getting older quietly excused ourselves. As one pre-facelift socialite explained, "After 10 o'clock, those fine lines start to look like crevasses." iB

At the Young Friends of the Public Garden party, from top: Lisa and Alex Pierpont; Stephens Dunne and Andrew Cabot; Kim Stockwell and Peter Webster; Karyn and Kevin Lamb.

MAKING TRACKS

Even if you've never snowboarded, it's impossible not to feel a huge thrill when you watch Jeremy Jones drop from a helicopter onto a tiny ridge and then blaze the first track down a near-vertical mountainside. As IMPROPER staffers huddled around a computer screen, gasping at footage of Jones' breath-taking moves, we realized why the Cape Cod native was named one of the 25 toughest guys in America by Men's Journal.

Luckily for us, Jones (not to be confused with the other snowboarder of the same name from Utah) made it back safely from his most recent trip to Europe, and we had a chance to catch up with him before he headed off to Alaska for more adventures.

After reading about Jones' exploits (page 20), we hope you'll be inspired to plan a few (slightly tamer) adventures of your own when the snow falls this season.

CAPTAIN CRUNCH-TIME

As an avid reader of the IMPROPER, I have to say that my favorite cover to date is the Jason Varitek cover. It was such a fitting tribute to the 2004 World Champions to have the "unofficial captain" on the cover. Varitek has truly defined what being a Red Sox player is all about. The Walt Whitman quote also sums up an unbelievable season.

STOP PROMOTING SKIN

I realize Ezra Dyer's column on strip clubs (Nov. 17) was supposed to be light-hearted, but the subject matter is just not a joke. "Adult" entertainment, especially the live variety, is an industry that doesn't care who it exploits or humiliates to turn a profit. It's puzzling how such a grotesque and heartbreaking thing has been mainstreamed, and how so many decent people have been persuaded to fuel a demand for it. Guys should know that doing so is unlikely to increase women's esteem for them, and it's doubtful that women's toleration for this profoundly disrespectful stuff increases men's esteem for us. The skin industry has lost its taboo, but it still degrades men's and women's sexuality alike. Who benefits from the normalization of obscenity?

PUBLICAN NOMINEES

THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN's 2005 Beloved Bartenders issue comes out March 23, and the deadline to nominate your favorite tapsmith or mixmaster is approaching. Turn to page 75 of this issue for a nomination form, or print one out at www.improper.com. Entries must be received by January 3. Questions? Send an e-mail to jessica@improper.com.

STOP PROMOTING FUR

I'm very disappointed that your magazine feels the need to include fur in its photo shoots. In your Nov. 3 issue, you have a pair of shoes and a jacket made of mink. The animals from which this fur comes live in cramped cages until they're large enough to be killed. The manner in which they're killed is also pretty horrific—they're electrocuted in the rectum. Please do not support the fur industry anymore. Needless suffering so that someone can wear shoes with fur on them has to stop!

—ELLA DUBOIS
Boston

CORRECTIONS

The photo that ran in the Performing Arts calendar of the Nov. 17 issue was misidentified. Tea at Five, starring Kate Mulgrew, is playing at the Shubert Theatre December 7–19.

We incorrectly reported that the boutique Good is having a 15 percent off sale for Beacon Hill's "First Thursday" event December 2.

CONTRIBUTORS

TATIANA

Los Angeles–based photographer Tatiana had a chance to combine her passion for snowboarding with her love of photography when she shot Jeremy Jones for this issue's cover and feature story. "Jonesing for a Rush" begins on page 20.

RYAN BRANDT

Ryan Brandt grew up on the coast of New Hampshire, scouring New England for the best adventures in every season. Some of his favorites for winter near Boston can be found in "Snow Escape," on page 22. Today, Brandt contributes to Outside, Skiing and the Los Angeles Times, among others.

new in town

REOPENING THE VAULT

The Vault originally opened in downtown's Liberty Square in 1997, much to the delight of discerning diners and businessmen looking for a quality power lunch. Brian O'Neill and company bought the restaurant in 2001 and reinvented it three times, first with an Italian/Asian theme, then as an upscale Italian steakhouse, and finally with a focus on Italian fine dining. In the year since the restaurant shut its doors, we all thought the story had ended. But in fact, there's a new chapter. Three friends and restaurateurs decided the Vault needed another chance: Packy Norton (who also runs the Chicken Box in Nantucket), fellow Nantucketer Ty Costa (of Straight Wharf Restaurant) and Barry Hannon, owner of Jamaica Plain's Dogwood Cafe, got together and reopened the space in late November.

Downtown workers "told us they were dying for a new place for lunch and that they missed the Vault," Norton explains. The owners are temporarily keeping the restaurant's name (there's a bank vault in the basement) and say they're planning a "name-our-restaurant" contest for the near future.

At first glance, the place hasn't changed. It's got the same polished, elegant decor with lots of dark wood, a fireplace on one end and an enormous bar. But the owners aim to take it down a notch or two in terms of showy atmosphere. They've replaced some of the dining tables with hightop bar-style tables and added two giant TVs above the bar. "Before, it was fine dining," Norton says. "Now the overtone is more casual. You can sit back and read the paper, or you can sit by the fireplace for dinner."

What's old is new at the Vault.

Instead of the Vault's previous emphasis on high-end food and wines, the new wine options are standard (roughly 30 wines are offered by the bottle and about 15 by the glass), and the food runs the gamut. The menu holds everything from bar fare—grilled paninis ($7.95); chicken tenders and wings ($8.95); fried calamari and burgers ($9)—to gussied up options like shrimp shu mai ($11.95), seared ahi tuna ($13.95) and Angus steak ($22). Let's hope the Vault has at last found a bankable concept. Food is served 11:30 am-11 pm; bar is open until 2 am. 105 Water St., Boston (617-292-3355). —E.H.

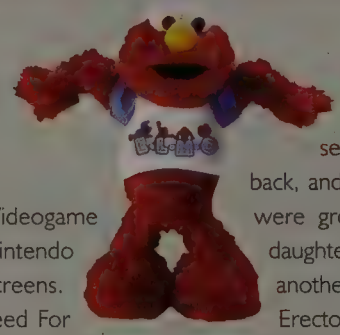
FEELING BALMY



I'm not sure exactly what message the campy brand Agent Provocateur is trying to send with its Titillation lip and nipple balm. The $36 package resembles a sex toy, consisting of two spheres that you unscrew. One orb holds a nourishing lip plumper that makes lips look fuller and more seductive and also includes a tingling, cooling agent. The other sphere holds a hydrating nipple refresher containing Wild Indigo, which is said to help stimulate the senses. Incidentally, the nipple balm has a sweet flavor. So, if you're oh-so-dedicated to your beauty regime and simply must rehydrate your nipples, go to www.agentprovocateur.com to get yourself some.

DAZED IN TOYLAND

Inevitably, every holiday season there's one toy that flies off shelves faster than you can say Tickle Me Elmo, leaving parents and gift givers to roam the aisles in desperation. What plaything tops little Eddie and Susie's list this year? We surveyed the experts at local toy stores to find out.

Boing! 729 Centre St., Jamaica Plain (617-522-7800).

Elain Hackney, owner: This year, one of the things that's really great is called Kick It Stick It. It's a hover-action, six-inch puck that you charge. You can use it indoors or outdoors, and it works on carpets and hardwood floors. You tap it with your foot or a hockey stick and it just glides along. Another is called 20 Q. It's a little round thing you hold in your hand. When you turn it on, letters come along the screen and it says, "I know what you're thinking." You have to think of something and it'll ask you questions and narrow it down within 20 questions. Calico Critters have been around a long time and they're still very popular. Lego has their knights in a canister. It's a knight kingdom with individual knights and those are really popular.

KB Toys 100 Cambridgeside Place, Cambridge (617-494-8519).

John Mazzarella, assistant manager: Videogame systems are pretty hot right now, like the Nintendo DS. It's kind of like a Game Boy, but with two screens. The hot games are Grand Theft Auto and Need For Speed Underground 2. For toys, we have stuffed toys that are really squishy and soft called the Snugeez. They come in soccer balls, fish, cows. Power Ranger action figures. And the Tickle Me Elmo of this season is the E-L-M-O Dancing Plush. It's an Elmo doll that does a parody of the YMCA dance and spells out his own name.

Magic Beans, 312 Harvard St., Brookline (617-264-2326).

Sheri Gurock, owner: The big-ticket hot item for boys is the Robosapien, a robot that performs a multitude of actions. It dances, karate chops, it walks forward and back. It's really easy to play with for kids who are technologically oriented. We're also seeing a lot of nostalgia. Cabbage Patch dolls are back, and all of us who were part of that craze when we were growing up are parents now and we want our daughters to have one the way we did. Erector Sets are another nostalgia thing. They've come out with an Erector remote control car. It's a combination of the nostalgia of the Erector Set and the basic construction toy. For younger kids, Elmo is definitely still big. Thomas the Tank Engine train sets are really big. Gund has come out with a Sesame Street finger puppet stage. We're selling a lot of those.

Zoinks! 1 Faneuil Hall Marketplace, Boston (617-227-6266).

Roisin Barrett, general manager: The things that seem to be going well for us are games. We have this game called Gobblet, it's a cross between checkers and tic-tac-toe and you gobble up your opponent. It's really been flying. Also, knickknacky things like Rubik's Cubes and anything SpongeBob (because of the movie).

HOT DOG!

Sit-Down Sausage... Fenway's favorite vendor, David Littlefield (better known as the Sausage Guy), has put down roots in the former home of tubesteak staple Joe and Nemo's, atop Beacon Hill. Fans of the famous sausages can now choose how and where to eat the huge links: You can still order from the cart Thursday through Saturday year-round on Lansdowne Street, or you can sit down at the casual new joint. At the Sausage Guy restaurant, Littlefield has expanded his repertoire, offering an array of new kinds of hot dogs as well as hand-packed burgers and hand-cut fries. 138 Cambridge St., Boston (617-722-0016). www.thesausageguy.com.

Home Brew Hero... Lots of people like to brew their own beer, and lots of people's home brew tastes like fermented socks. But Michael Robinson has taken his hobby to the next level, earning first place in Beer Summit's national home brew contest. His winning Witbier not only bagged him a $1,000 cash prize, but Boston Beer Co. (makers of Sam Adams) will be brewing a batch of his recipe to be served at a few bars around town. We might have to try it, even though we're a little bitter that Robinson's entry beat out our Grandma's Original-Recipe Mango-Pomegranate Pilsner.

Warm goat cheese salad at the Navy Yard

In the Navy Yard... Unless you're in the mood for pricey pizza, Charlestown's dining options are split pretty evenly between the high-end (Olives, Meze, Tangierino,) and low-end (Warren Tavern, Tavern on the Water). Now, the Navy Yard Bistro and Wine Bar, new in C-town as of September, bridges the gap with its reasonably priced menu. "People see the word 'bistro' and think $25 entrées," says owner John Moore. But Moore aims to keep the main courses (which range from pan-roasted monkfish with chorizo, lobster risotto, cipollini and pea tendrils to hanger steak) at an average of $15. 1 First Ave., Charlestown Navy Yard (617-242-0036). www.navyyardbistro.com.

Maki Me Hungry... Venerable Beacon Hill sushi/noodle spot Ma Soba recently revamped its menu with a selection of West Coast–inspired rolls. Of particular note are the baked rolls, which consist of a maki roll topped with seafood and baked for 10 minutes. Two favorites are the snow cone roll ($11.95)—a California roll topped with lobster, albacore and sauce—and the disco shrimp roll ($11.95), which tops a spicy crab and avocado roll with shrimp and scallops. Just a warning: The disco shrimp roll might be the tastiest thing you ever eat. 156 Cambridge St., Boston (617-973-6680).

PAMPER YOUR PETS

When it comes to holiday shopping, Fido and Snowball need some love too, and these days pet gift options range far beyond milkbones and catnip. Here's what some local boutiques have in store for the four-legged friends on your list.

The Harness Play Pack (top and bottom) is at Pet Supplies Plus in West Roxbury.

Fi-Dough

103 Charles St., Boston (617-723-3266). www.fidough.com.

Your pet can recline in luxury with Fi-Dough's Easy Chair and Leatherette Sofa ($89.95 each), and travel in style with the faux-lambskin-lined Sherpa Bag on Wheels (starting at $89.90). Felines will go crazy for Kookamunga ($5.99) bubbles made with catnip.

No Bones About It

1786 Beacon St., Brookline (617-277-2627). www.nobonesaboutitgrooming.com.

Doggie can rest comfy in No Bones' divan-style Bagel Bed ($110–$150) or stave off the Boston chill in a stylish Dog Warmer ($32) Polar-Tec pajama body suit.

The Pet Cabaret

4278 Washington St., Roslindale (617-323-7387). www.thepetcabaret.com.

This pet supply store is like a Whole Foods for animals, specializing in organic pet foods and treats including Steve's Real Food and Newman's Own Organic for pets.

Pet Supplies Plus

1220 VFW Pkwy., West Roxbury (617-469-4545); 625 Southern Artery, Quincy (617-472-0505). www.petsuppliesplus.com.

The Harness Play Pack, starting at $24.95, holds everything man's best friend could need for a fun outing. The kit, which snaps handily on Fido's back, includes a harness, leash, flying disc, water bottle, pick-a-poop bags and even some room for your own possessions. Back at home, cats can live the high life in the Kitty Condo ($22.88 and up), a carpeted cathouse ranging from one to four stories.

Polka Dog Bakery

256 Shawmut Ave., Boston (617-338-5155). www.polkadog.com.

Treat your pet to Polka Dog Lunch Box ($14.50), which comes fully packed with gourmet dog treats.

Violet Cosmetics

Purple Reign... West Roxbury-based skin care company Violet Cosmetics has found a new home among the legions of salons and spas on Newbury Street. Twin sisters and former IMPROPER bachelorettes Susanna and Rousanna Gevondian run the business end of the skin boutique, which opened in November, while their mother (and company namesake), Violet, creates the handmade products used in all their treatments. Violet specializes in facials, which last 75 minutes and use handmade products, and selections include herbal, hydrofruit, and Victorian rose treatments. Body wraps, massages and waxing are available too. 257 Newbury St., Boston (617-262-7546). www.violetskinboutique.com.

Good News and Bad News... First the bad news: According to a recent study by Trust for America's Health, obesity is on the rise in the U.S. The good news? According to the same report, our beloved commonwealth has the third lowest obesity rate in the country (behind only Hawaii and Colorado). To what can we attribute our sensible eating and overall healthiness? Perhaps the fact that in another recent study, this one conducted by Morgan Quitno Press, Massachusetts was also named the smartest state in the union for the second straight year. Combine that with two professional sports championships, and 2004 truly is the year of the Masshole.

Skating the Square... Already the stuff of a snowy Currier & Ives print, Harvard Square ups its winter quaint quotient with a new ice skating rink, courtesy of the Charles Hotel. A longtime ambition of real estate mogul and Charles Hotel proprietor Dick Friedman, the 2,900-square-foot rink in the Charles' courtyard opens to the public December 11. Skate rentals are rinkside, as is a cabana, manned by the Harvard ice hockey team, serving hot chocolate, mulled cider and hot toddies.

Livening Things Up... November was a good month for the local live music scene. The deVille Lounge (the swanky half of Kings bowling alley) introduced its live music night November 13, becoming one of a few Back Bay spots where you take in a live band without paying a cover. Over in the Bulfinch Triangle, Anthem started its live music series November 19 and will continue with jazz, Latin, acoustic and pop shows every Friday and Saturday from 10 pm till 1 am in its main dining room. Kings, 10 Scotia St., Boston (617-266-2695), www.backbaykings.com; Anthem, 138 Portland St., Boston (617-523-8383), www.anthemboston.com.

GOING HOUSE

Joining the ranks of the landed gentry

If you're thinking about buying a condo, here's one way to do it. First, go to Harpoon Oktoberfest the night before and drink IPAs until you get that metallic taste in your mouth. Then, later on that night, get in a wedgie contest with your friend Whits and pull down your pants so onlookers can judge your boxer thongs and take pictures. Then, the next morning, go look at open houses with your girlfriend as "research" for when you actually might want to buy. Except, instead of just looking, go right ahead and buy a place that day. There you have it—from striving to inflict an Atomic Wedgie to striving to understand a 5/1 adjustable rate mortgage within 24 hours.

Prior to this, my most recent impulse-buy was a Swiffer WetJet, a purchase that taught me an important lesson about not going to Walgreens drunk. But hey, if you've got a Swiffer, you're going to need a floor, and a few months ago, one of my coworkers lent me Homebuying for Dummies so I could learn the step-by-step process of buying a house. Honestly, this book was far too complicated. I barely made it past Chapter 1: "Houses: how to tell them from horses and hoses." I guess I needed something more my speed, like Homebuying for Corky from Life Goes On.

The new crib is in Southie. A lot of people think Southie's this gritty, slummy place because of Whitey Bulger, Good Will Hunting and minor crime problems like that fatal gang fight earlier this year. But it's really becoming yuppified, just like every other neighborhood. Of course, it's not completely there yet, which is why I'm buying a bunch of Celtics track suits to wear until gentrification is complete. Just kidding, Southie neighbors! Please don't key my BMW.

I'm going to miss my next door neighbor Elmer, with his crazy-dash-filled-signs-all-over-the-laundry-room and his flypaper hanging outside the building year-round, to snag those pesky December mosquitoes. I'm going to miss Scott, with whom I've lived for four years, and stealing his Kiehl's products that I'm too cheap and closeted-metrosexual to buy myself. I'm going to miss my messy bedroom, as my new roommate has expressed an opinion that an unobstructed path from the bed to the doorway does not constitute a clean room.

Speaking of which, living with a girl is something I've never done, either. It remains to be seen how well she fares at taming the Wild Ez, an uncivilized creature that washes all its clothes on the cold cycle, regardless of color. A hairy beast that will eat dinner with a tiny salad fork to avoid washing a big one, which are all in the dishwasher. An uncouth savage that keeps using the same Oral B toothbrush long after the blue wear indicator has signaled it's time for a new one. Her whip hand had better be strong if that toilet seat is ever to be down.

One other thing that people have told me I'd have to prepare for is fixing problems myself. I suppose these are people who've had helpful landlords in the past. In my current apartment, if I have a problem, my building management company promptly dispatches someone to make the problem worse while Elmer takes the opportunity to come snoop around. Most recently, this consisted of a clogged furnace flue, and I came home one day to find my living room covered in dust, the ceiling torn up, and Elmer sitting on my couch happily watching the proceedings (thus garnering him a nomination in the Nosies, the Nosiest Neighbor in Boston awards). The job is now done, but they never got around to repairing the ceiling, so a large, exposed vent pipe now runs over the couch. I choose to look at it as industrial-chic.

Then there's the kitchen sink, which Elmer complained made too much noise with the hot water running. So the hot-water spigot was replaced with one that's both quieter and threaded backwards. Now, when you go to turn on the hot water, tighten the tap instead of opening it, you then have to force it open, inevitably spraying water all over yourself. It's a great system and I'm really going to miss it.

But that's the past. The future is next week, when I'm going to be $150,000 in debt and possibly have potpourri in my bathroom. What happened to the guy who used to get in drunken wedgie contests? Well, the new place is only two blocks away from Whits'. iB

THE COLLINS CARD

BY CHRIS COLLINS

IN THE END, D-LOWE D-LIVERED

From head case to head ace, Derek Lowe redeemed his season in October.

As the champagne was spewing at Busch Stadium after Game 4 of the World Series, almost all of the Red Sox were sobbing with joy. Those tears have long since dried up and the Red Sox are back to the cold part of this relationship—business. The uniform stays the same, but the players do not. And there's one guy New England and I are especially going to miss: Derek Lowe.

The same Derek Lowe who endured a rocky 14–12 season. The same Derek Lowe who was down as much as he was up. The same Derek Lowe with the embarrassing 5.42 earned run average. The same, emotional Derek Lowe who, unfortunately for him, doesn't have a great poker face.

Everyone surmised Lowe couldn't handle a contract year. He couldn't handle the fact that he turned down an alleged three-year, $27 million deal. Simply put, he was not consistent, as guys making that much money are supposed to be.

But something happened beginning in August. The Red Sox fortunes turned, and not coincidentally so did Lowe's. It's a fact lost in David Ortiz's walk-off specials and Curt Schilling's bloody sock. When it mattered most, D-Lowe delivered.

During a stretch in early August to mid-September, Lowe won all six of his starts—a remarkable recovery. It seemed outing by outing in May, June and July, Lowe's value dropped to Internet-stock low. Then he started getting into the seventh inning again. His sinker was moving. And one of his "out" pitches, the curveball, was back in his repertoire.

It wasn't a total surprise. The reason the Red Sox even played the Yankees in the 2003 American League Championship Series was Lowe. His relief performance in Game 5 of the division series, striking out the last two Oakland A's batters, was every bit as clutch as Bernie Carbo's three-run homer or Dwight Evans' catch while falling into the right field seats.

So as Lowe's critics kept harping on his fragile psyche, and rumors circulated of his party-boy nature, Lowe pitched his way back into the hearts of Red Sox fans when the pressure started really cooking around here.

Remember, when the starting rotation was announced for the Anaheim Angels series, there was one major omission—Derek Lowe. He was relegated to the bullpen. He didn't like it. Fortunately, he did something about it.

Because of the tendon injury in Curt Schilling's ankle, Lowe's place in Red Sox lore changed forever. All of sudden, Lowe was needed. He came in to pitch the 10th inning of the Game 3 against Anaheim and picked up the series clinching win.

Lowe stepped up in Game 4 versus the Yankees and kept the Sox alive, pitching five-plus solid innings.

He saved his best, though, for Game 7, allowing only one hit in six innings, throwing only 69 pitches, and again picking up the series-clinching win.

The same thing happened in the World Series. With Lowe officially moved to the rotation, he was a master in the clinching game, blanking the Cardinals. When it was over, Lowe was 3–0 in the playoffs, with his three victories coming in the three series-clinching games. Amazing.

Lowe, though, has been even more impressive since he helped make history in Boston. He was one of the first guys to hug Johnny Pesky. On national TV he said,

> BECAUSE OF THE TORN TENDON IN CURT SCHILLING'S ANKLE, LOWE'S PLACE IN RED SOX LORE CHANGED FOREVER.

"You can come home now, Bill Buckner!" The head case was nowhere to be found.

Lowe couldn't be a more likable guy. It was so easy to see why thousands of residents came out to support him when his adopted hometown, Quincy, threw a "Derek Lowe Day" in his honor. Lowe didn't have to accept the honor. There were tough times when neighbors, probably kids, weren't always so welcoming. There was a time when eggs were thrown at his home.

But Lowe endured and we're all better for it. He really showed his true mental makeup when he was needed most.

Now Lowe is in perfect position to make a killing. Like the football player Rod Tidwell in Jerry Maguire, Lowe's ready to say "show me the money," and somebody undoubtedly will. Damn, I just wish that someone were the Red Sox. IB

ERNIE BOCH JR.

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Ernie Boch Jr. was born and raised in Norwood, where his grandfather owned the Route 1 car dealership that formed the nucleus of what is now known as "the Automile." In the 1970s, Ernie Boch Sr. (famous for his hokey "Come on down!" ads) acquired Oldsmobile, Toyota and Subaru distributorships, followed by franchises for Kia, Mitsubishi, Honda and Dodge. Ernie Jr. began in the business as a teenager, working as a "lot boy" and later as a used car salesman, before becoming general manager. In 1996, his father promoted him to vice president in charge of all the Boch retail operations, and in 2003, following his father's death, he took over the rest of the family's interests. His business empire now includes extensive automotive enterprises, vast real estate holdings, four FM radio stations and a marina on Martha's Vineyard. Boch finances a yearly college scholarship along with a fund named for his grandfather. He is on the board of Cape Cod's Boch Center for the Performing Arts and has backed an off-Broadway play in addition to offering substantial support to the Massachusetts Film Bureau. He lives in Norwood with his wife, Kristen, and their two children.

Jonathan Soroff: OK, so cars, real estate, radio stations, music. Are you the consummate Renaissance man?
Ernie Boch Jr.: Some friends have called me that. I don't believe it.
JS: Rude question: Exactly how rich are you?
EB: Put it this way: Last year, we did $1.3 billion in sales with zero debt. A lot of companies do a billion in sales, but not with zero debt. So you figure about five percent to the net…you do the math.
JS: Ever feel bad for poor people, like Donald Trump?
EB: I'm poor compared to him.
JS: Growing up, were you embarrassed by your father's ads?
EB: Of course. Not only that, but I was on TV as a 10-year-old, doing ads where I said how we put five brand new tires on every used car. I got a lot of ribbing at school.
JS: Speaking of embarrassing ads, how does Dave Dinger do it?
EB: Dave Dinger doesn't do it anymore. He sold out.
JS: If you were a car, what make, model and year would you be?
EB: Right now, this second? A 2005 Bentley GT Coupe.
JS: Nice. How many cars do you own?
EB: I only own one car myself, personally—a 1976 Triumph.
JS: OK, at any given time, how many cars does the company own?
EB: Tens of thousands.

STRANGE COMPLAINTS AND BAD LETTERS ARE MY PASSION: "NICE HONDA COMMERCIAL, BUT WHAT'S UP WITH THOSE GLASSES? YOU PUTZ!" AND THEY SPELLED "PUTZ" WRONG.

JS: Biggest toy?
EB: My jet. A Sovereign. It's the latest and greatest corporate jet, and it's the ultimate freedom, I think.
JS: Do people who buy a Chrysler PT Cruiser wake up a few months later and say, "What was I thinking?!"
EB: [Laughs.] Probably. You know, that car went from being the most popular car in the country to they can't even give it away.
JS: Best way to get a deal on a new car?
EB: Either know someone who works at the dealership or go in the last three days of the month.
JS: One secret that anyone buying a car should know?
EB: OK, here it is: The most powerful thing somebody can do when negotiating on a car is threaten to, or actually leave the dealership.
JS: Surest way to spot a lemon?
EB: You mean a brand new car that doesn't perform well? You can generally avoid that by doing your research, but I'd say that any new car that has serious problems within the first hundred miles is a lemon.
JS: What is that "new car smell"?
EB: I think it's a combination of plastic and manmade fiber.
JS: Best car for picking up women?
EB: Well, the standard Corvette is tried and true. Not that I'd know anymore. I'm married.
JS: What do the following cars say about their owners: a white Porsche?
EB: A penis substitute.
JS: Not cocaine dealer?
EB: That was the '80s.
JS: Red Camaro?
EB: Mullet.
JS: Green Volvo?
EB: It could either be a very bland guy or a really sophisticated, cool lady.
JS: Band Aid–colored Ford Taurus?
EB: "I need help."
JS: Biggest bargain in a car these days?
EB: One of the Koreans: Kia or Hyundai. They're good cars and cheap, cheap, cheap.
JS: Enzo, Carrera GT or McLaren SLR?
EB: Enzo. The McLaren just looks too mean.
JS: Stupidest option on a car?
EB: Well, I'm not crazy about those back-up sensors. They're obnoxious. If you're backing up, you're supposed to be looking behind you anyway.
JS: How many speeding tickets do you get?
EB: I used to have a lot. Up until about eight years ago, I was a terrible driver, but I learned my lesson. I almost never drive now, though. I made a one-of-a-kind limousine by cutting a Forester Turbo [Subaru] in half and stretching it 26 feet. It's the only turbo, four-wheel-drive Forester limo on the planet. So I mostly use that.
JS: If you were going to a desert island, what one CD would you take?
EB: Miles Davis, Kind of Blue. I love jazz.
JS: Do you play an instrument?
EB: I'm a guitar hacker, but I wouldn't call myself a musician. Most of my friends are either professional musicians or in the entertainment business.
JS: OK, name-drop for me.
EB: OK. I'm very friendly with Joey Kramer [from Aerosmith], Paul Geary [from Extreme], radio guys like Greg Hill from 'AAF, comedians like Lenny Clarke…
JS: How's Chico the llama (from the old TV ads) doing?
EB: Alive and well and living on Martha's Vineyard.
JS: Most kids don't have it as good as that llama.
EB: Chico and Charmin and Burrito have it very good.
JS: Strangest complaint you've ever gotten from a customer?
EB: Oh, God! That's what I live for! Strange complaints and bad letters are my passion. I mean, I appreciate the good ones, but I frame the bad ones. [He grabs two framed letters and reads.] "Dear Mr. Boch, or Ernie, if I may. Shame on you for advertising on the Ellen Degenerate show! My wife and I were on our way to your place until we saw your ad on that pervert's TV show." Then there's this e-mail: "Nice Honda commercial, but what's up with those glasses? They'd be hot if it was 1952. You putz! I would never buy a car from you because you wear those glasses." And they spelled "putz" wrong. Isn't that great?
JS: What's the worst part of the car salesman stigma?
EB: Before I got married, I was madly in love with a girl. I kept asking her out, and finally I said, "What's the problem?" She said, "You sell cars. I would never go out with a car salesman." That was the worst for me.
JS: Last question: Do car dealers actually think those balloons out front are going to make me stop and buy a car?
EB: Yes. Absolutely. [Laughs.] It's just part of the festive atmosphere we're trying to cultivate. iB

where's jeremy jones?

Whether riding mountains or waves, Jeremy Jones takes it to the extreme

BY EZRA DYER

PHOTOGRAPHED BY TATIANA

"I can't ever remember being scared for my life snowboarding," says Jeremy Jones, Cape native and big-mountain snowboard star. If you've ever seen Jones ride in any of the Teton Gravity Research extreme ski movies, that might be hard to comprehend—many of the mountains he tackles are accessible only by helicopter and feature lines so narrow and steep they look like a string of dental floss hanging off the top of the Hancock building. Maybe he's not scared for his life, but after watching one of his TGR segments, you might wonder how Jones has made it to the ripe old age of 29.

"I guess in '96 I saw my life flash before my eyes," Jones admits. "I was hiking to a couloir and had a cornice break on me on a knife-edge ridge with no rideable lines. I took a 50-foot free-fall into a tight chute, set off an avalanche and fell 1,200 feet down in eight seconds. I was doing about 80 miles per hour." Eighty miles per hour—in front of an avalanche? "No," Jones says. "In an avalanche."

That kind of situation wasn't so much of a problem on the mountain where Jones first honed his chops, Sugarloaf in Maine. Jones attended Carrabassett Ski Academy right down the road from the slopes, and while you don't need a helicopter or avalanche beacon at the Loaf, Jones says the weather there hardens Carrabassett alumni against anything else in the world. "I've never seen anything like it," he says. "I've definitely had some gnarly missions up there. I've had days where you might as well have been on Everest."

Chilly peak notwithstanding, Jones ranks Sugarloaf, along with Stowe in Vermont, as one of the top two mountains in the East. "Sugarloaf with their direct fall line, Stowe with their hiking above the growth, which is pretty unique to the East. Out west, Jackson Hole and Squaw Valley [where Jones now lives] have always been special places to me."

During the off-season, Jones shelves his snowboard and breaks out his surfboard, spending 40 to 60 days per year riding the waves. Last year, he took on the breakers in Indonesia, something like the aquatic equivalent of the fearsome slopes he's known for attacking on his snowboard. "They were mandatory barrels with really shallow bottoms. Getting ready to take off, the only way you're going to make them is to get barreled and make it out." To underscore the danger of an inopportune wipeout, Jones acknowledges that surfing in Indonesia did make him fear for his life.

As impossible as some of his endeavors might look—Teton Gravity Research's slogan is "Purveyors of the Inconceivable"—Jones never tempts fate on a slope that's giving him a bad vibe, even when the cameras are ready to roll and the pressure's on to get the next great shot. "I do that a lot," he says. "In my head, I know that if we're gonna be pushing it, I say, 'Don't ride anything you don't feel good about.' It's tough to walk away from a line that you think you can probably do, but later on I always say, 'Why was that even a tough decision?' You've got to listen to your gut instinct. There've been times when the doors are off the helicopter, the camera's ready to roll, and I say, 'Sorry guys, not today. Something's bothering me.'"

It might help that the guys making the movies have a personal interest in Jones' well-being, as Teton Gravity Research was co-founded by his two older brothers, Steve and Todd. "I get to spend a bunch of time with them," Jones says. "I travel half the winter for the TGR movies. We go to the coolest places in the world, and I'm sitting there in the helicopters with my two brothers, and we look at each other and say, 'Is this real?'"

The elder Jones brothers are skiers, which begs the question of whether Jeremy has ever longed to trade in his board for some sticks—and the answer is a definite no. There's always new ground to be broken in his mission to fuse freestyle tricks with big-mountain riding, and he needs all the practice he can get. "Out west, I can find powder every day, and I'm always working on something. I never tire of the feeling of standing sideways on my board." iB

SNOW ESCAPE

SIX NEARBY ADVENTURES TO HELP YOU SHAKE OFF THE COLD-WEATHER BLUES

BY RYAN BRANDT

Ho hum, it's wintertime in Boston again. Your liver is begging for a break from the bar scene, and the thought of Jack Frost nipping at your nose actually sounds appealing...but sitting behind the wheel for hours to get to the ski resorts up north does not. No options? Think again. Within a 90-minute drive from the city, you can yodel atop coastal mountains, thwack a ball on the links, or hang ten with the best of them. Here are six outdoor winter adventures that can spice up a midweek evening or add fun to a weekend getaway. It may get a bit chilly, but what did you expect, Florida?

SURFING THE NEW HAMPSHIRE COAST

Rye, N.H.

"Obviously, I'd rather be surfing every day just in trunks, but summers here can be really flat," says Jeff Pilibosian of Seabrook, N.H. "We're lucky to get waist to chest-high waves. The winter storms bring in larger, more powerful waves."

While the New England coast holds countless surfing spots from Rhode Island to northern Maine, the stretch of coastline in Rye, N.H., is one of Pilibosian's favorites—offering renowned rocky point breaks like Rye on the Rocks and Fox Hill and the tamer beach break of Jenness State Beach. At Jenness, there's something surreal about running toward the Atlantic covered head to toe in five millimeters of neoprene and a foot of snow crunching beneath your feet. When the surf's up, the parking lot is dotted with guys hopping around to stay warm as they get their boards on and off cars, plus the incredulous onlookers bundled in coats or nestled in their cars with the heat on high.

"Sure, it's colder," says Pilibosian, who took up the sport 24 years ago at the age of 7. "You're wearing at least an extra 20 pounds of rubber. But when the waves are good, you don't think about anything other than that next set coming in."

After bracing yourself for the splash of the first few waves and paddling beyond the break, you have your pick of the waves crashing in sections along the entire length of the mile-long cove, because the below-freezing weather (with water temperatures in the 30s) keeps all the fair-weather surfers at home until after Memorial Day.

SNOWSHOEING MOUNT AGAMENTICUS

York, Maine

Like many avid mountain bikers, Troy Michaud spends the warmer months racing along the trails of Mt. A—as Agamenticus is known to locals. Once the snow falls, snowshoeing provides a different perspective. "You don't see much when you're flying along on a mountain bike," he says. "Snowshoeing is a completely different experience here because it's so peaceful. I love coming out after a new snow and breaking trail. I've seen deer, owls, all types of birds and even moose."

The 692-foot peak used to be home to an eight-trail ski resort that closed in the early 1970s, and remnants of the chairlifts poke through the snow along the Ring Trail. Two-thirds of the way up the hill, the well-marked path winds its way through hemlock and oak forests and across the clearings of the old ski trails now overgrown with blueberry bushes and young birch trees. A handful of spur trails lead to the summit, which offers views to the northwest that can stretch all the way to the White Mountains, 90 miles away, on a clear day. The rugged coastline of the Atlantic is laid out to the east.

"That view has to be the highlight," says Robin Stanley, Mount Agamenticus Conservation Coordinator, who receives her paycheck from a group of conservation organizations and the towns of South Berwick and York, which came together than 30 years ago to help protect the area. "You have rolling hills on one side and the coast on the other, there aren't many places like it."

TUBING AT AMESBURY SPORTS PARK

Amesbury, Mass.

You have to look only as far as the child restrictions at the Amesbury Sports Park to deduce that this is the king of sledding hills. Children ages 4 to 6 must wear helmets, and kids younger than that aren't allowed. Too bad for them. Now in its 13th year of operation, the tube park boasts eight quarter-mile-long runs that hurtle riders down the terraced terrain at speeds up to 35 miles per hour. The best part? There's no hiking—three rope tows pull you up the hill while you relax on the back of your 3-foot-diameter red tube.

For all the warnings though, sledding can be fun for anyone wanting to satisfy their inner 9-year-old. "The craziest thing I've seen was four generations of one family all coming down in a train together. The great-grandma, she was in her 80s, and she had to leave her walker at the base of the lift. But she was laughing along with the rest of them," says the park's general manager, Bryan McCann.

With snowmaking, and 40 lights lining the hill, the park operates weekday evenings and throughout the weekend, providing quite a spectacle for drivers whizzing by on I-495 and those taking a break from the action in the slopeside bar. But get there early on Saturdays and Sundays: The park's 750-tube capacity can fill in a matter of hours.

GOLFING AT CAPE COD'S OCEAN EDGE

Brewster, Mass.

The Cape conjures visions of glorious sunlit days spent lolling on the beach or barbecuing with friends—hardly typical scenes of winter. Last year, though, while Boston got dumped with just shy of 40 inches of snow, the mid-Cape got only half that amount for the season. The same infamous nor'easters that dump snow on the city drop rain on the ocean-surrounded arm. That means it's time to dig out the clubs you stowed away in October and head south.

Situated on Route 6A in Brewster, a half-hour's drive from the Sagamore Bridge, Ocean Edge Resort & Golf Club boasts one of the Cape's most challenging and palatial golf courses. Like most courses in the area, Ocean Edge remains open through the winter months, but its sand-based greens allow golfers to putt on the same undulating carpets used in summer. (Soil-based greens are more susceptible to damage from frost, so many resorts set-up crude "temporary greens" on the fairways.)

The best things about winter golf are that the prices dip with the temperature (which hovers in the 40s) and the crowds have flown south with the birds. "If you don't like playing in 90-degree heat with 90 percent humidity, the winter months can be great," says Ocean Edge club pro Harry Parker. "As long as you keep your hands and ears warm, you're pretty comfortable." If the temperature gets too arctic, just slip on a pair of winter golf gloves. The tricky, 6,602-yard course has its share of narrow holes and doglegs lined by evergreen that will swallow the slightest of slices and hooks—the 601-yard, par 5 eighth hole may be the one that gets your blood boiling the most.

CROSS-COUNTRY SKIING AT WALDEN POND

Concord, Mass.

"The wonderful purity of nature at this season is a most pleasing fact. Every decayed stump and moss-grown stone and rail, and the dead leaves of autumn, are concealed by a clean napkin of snow. In the bare fields and tinkling woods, see what virtue survives."

—HENRY DAVID THOREAU

"See what virtue survives"? If there was ever a place to understand what exactly Thoreau was rambling on about, it's Walden Pond. This is the spot where the naturalist holed up in a cabin for more than two years and wrote one of the most famous pieces of American literature. Winter is certainly the best time of year to reflect on Thoreau's words, when the blanket of snow muffles all human noise. You might find inspiration yourself, circumnavigating the pond on skis.

The 1.7-mile-long, five-foot-wide Pond Path hugs the water's border, ambling through stands of pitch and white pine and oak forest and taking you past the site where the writer's cabin formerly stood. At the west end of the park, you can extend your expedition by crossing over into more than 15 miles of trails on conservation land owned by the town of Lincoln.

"I went out skiing one day in March and everything was perfect," says park supervisor Denise Morrissey. "It wasn't too cold, the water was reflecting this incredibly blue sky, the snow conditions were great. It was one of those 'life is good' kind of feelings." Sounds like a place for anyone to find their inner naturalist.

NIGHT SKIING AT BRADFORD AND GUNSTOCK

Haverhill, Mass. (Bradford) and Gilford, N.H. (Gunstock)

Both Bradford and Gunstock are relatively tame compared with their bigger White and Green Mountain brethren to the north, but with long shadows playing along trails and wind whipping at your face, skiing takes on a new dimension at night no matter where you are. Bumps and natural features—dissolving and then reappearing in the flat light—can turn normally easy terrain into a challenge for the most advanced skiers and riders.

Whether the visibility is regarded as an exciting test or daunting deterrent, the strongest attraction of both sites is their proximity to Boston. At Bradford, a half-hour's drive from the city, a top-to-bottom run on the 250 feet of vertical can take less than a minute. One hundred thousand watts of mercury vapor and halogen light pump across all 13 trails. Bradford also continues to make improvements, recently adding a new half-pipe and triple chair.

"It can get tricky between light poles, but that's just a few spots," says Seth Miles, who regularly ducks out of his Cambridge office to work as a night ski instructor at Bradford during the week. "It's so close. I can be working at my desk and skiing an hour later."

Further north, in Gilford, N.H., Gunstock offers a bit more varied terrain, with five lifts and almost half of its 50 trails staying open after the moon comes up. The Tiger Triple lift accesses the most challenging runs, like Cannonball and Redhat. No matter which mountain you choose, both will give you plenty of time to learn the basics or get your ski legs back before heading off to larger resorts for the weekend. IB

FAIR FORECAST

Individuals and teams compete at the Mushers Bowl every February in Maine.

There's no avoiding it: New England in the winter is a cold place. But even if you're not a ski bum, there are lots of opportunities for outdoor fun in the region. Here are a few winter carnivals that are worth a snowy excursion—or just a side trip on your next ski weekend.

North Conway, N.H., in the heart of the White Mountains, hosts what may be the region's biggest winter festival, the Mount Washington Valley Winter Carnival. Running from February 25 though March 6, 2005, the event features an opening-ceremonies performance by Disney on Ice skater and Soviet medalist Vitaly Opekan; a snow parade and fireworks show (February 26); an ice sculpture competition (February 27) and a slew of ski and sledding events and concerts. A button ($4, available at www.mwvevents.com) gets you into most of the events and activities—some, like the dog sled rides (February 27 and March 5) and the Chocolate Festival (February 27) cost extra.

New Hampshire's western neighbor, Vermont, hosts its own 10-day winter festival. The Stowe Winter Carnival (January 21–30, 2005) features a Fire and Ice theme, in honor of the town fire department's 100th anniversary. Events include a 15K cross-country ski race, a 5K snowshoe race, the "world's coldest parade," and a classic Vermont chicken pie church supper.

A little over two hours north of Boston, the neighboring towns of Freeport and Falmouth host the Maine Winter Fest, which takes place January 14–18, 2005. Unique activities here include the "fire-breathing drag-on slide," and the Luge Run, in which kids 10 and older can ride down the track with members of the USA Luge Team. The International Ice Park (in Freeport) and Snow Park (in Falmouth) feature sculptures by teams from around the world.

The next month, in Lovell, Maine (three hours north of Boston), you can have a real Arctic experience at the Mushers Bowl. As the name suggests, this three-day event (February 4–6) centers on dog-sled racing, with individuals and teams competing. Skijoring, in which a dog pulls a rider on skis, is another highlight.

Newport, R.I., is best known for its sailing and folk and jazz music events, but the town is also home to another of the area's bigger winter carnivals. The 17th annual Newport Winter Festival takes place from February 18 to 27, 2005. It features children's activities, ice sculpture displays, dance and music performances and other artistic displays, as well as historical mansion tours, and "ghost tours" of Belcourt Castle by the Newport Preservation Society. —David Plunkett

THE INSIDE STORY

LOCAL INSTITUTIONS OFFER INDOOR ATTRACTIONS TO ENTERTAIN YOUR BRAIN WHILE YOU STAY WARM.

BY WENDY WOLFSON PHOTOGRAPHS BY ERIC LEVIN

The Harvard Museum of Natural History houses thousands of rare and extinct animal specimens.

If the idea of standing in line for a ski lift or hiking across snowy fields leaves you cold, why not embark on some adventures of the indoor variety this winter? Boston's specialty libraries and collections hold fascinating (even downright odd) discoveries from lost works of art, to mummies and scandals, to skillful taxidermy. You can spend a day (or several) exploring their nooks and crannies and forget all about the icy temperatures outside.

NATURAL SELECTION

Stroll among the giant fossils of the Harvard Museum of Natural History and discover that nature has experimented over the long term in the weirdest of ways. For instance, the Palaeologus, a giant fanged creature that roamed the earth 35 million years ago during the Eocene period, evolved into the modern bunny rabbit.

The HMNH collections encompass stuffed gorillas, a giraffe, cheetahs, ocelots, lions, a Bengal tiger and thousands of birds that were shot, trapped or stolen for specimens in a more cavalier time. Skeletal whales swim suspended from the ceiling. Birds, categorized by species, have evocative names like the Blue Splendid Bird, the iridescent Quetzal, the Dollar Bird, the Purple Breasted Chatterer; and with unmistakable charisma even when embalmed, a stuffed raven who seems about to utter "Nevermore."

Some species are indeed nevermore. A glass case poignantly displays a model of a dodo bird—hunted to extinction in the 17th century. The case also houses a photograph of the gastric brooding frog, which disappeared from the Australian highlands in the mid 1980s. This fascinating creature swallowed its fertilized eggs and then regurgitated its live young when they were ready to hatch.

A new book, The Rarest of the Rare: Stories Behind the Treasures at the Harvard Museum of Natural History, by science writer Nancy Pick and photographer Mark Sloan, tells how the museum's mastodon skeleton was key to a notorious murder case. John White Webster, a Harvard professor of chemistry, murdered Harvard grad George Parkman in a dispute over money borrowed to buy the mastodon. Parkman disappeared. The janitor led investigators to Parkman's bones, distributed in various places, including a thorax and left thigh found in Webster's tea chest.

Also worth peeping at are the wildflower and plant specimens in the museum's famed glass flower collection. Though they look freshly picked, they were in fact crafted in obsessive detail over a 50-year period by German glass-flower Leopold Blaschka and his son, Rudolph. The carnivorous plant Drosera Rotundifolia, also known as the common sundew, is rendered in lifelike detail. Naturalist Charles Darwin admired the sundew because of the way its tentacles move to grab flies, and featured it in his tome Insectivorous Plants. You can compare the glass version with the real one when it blooms in New England's bogs come spring.

26 Oxford St., Cambridge. Daily 9 am–5 pm. Admission $7.50 (free Sunday 9 am–12 pm, Wednesday 3–5 pm). 617-495-3045. www.hmnh.harvard.edu.

GEEK CROSSING

Conversational Klingon anyone? You can achieve fluency by the spring thaw for your next trip to another dimension with tapes from the MIT Science Fiction Society Library. At 50,000 volumes the library contains the largest public collection of science fiction, fantasy and horror books in the Western Hemisphere. Among its holdings are the complete works of H.P. Lovecraft and Stephen King (products of morbid imaginations nourished young), obscure adventure yarns like George Chappell's Through Alimentary Canal with Gun and Camera (a 1930 precursor to Fantastic Voyage) as well as vintage pulp sci-fi magazines, several thousand foreign-language books and a handful of books on tape. The volunteer staff members are knowledgeable about the library's collection and some are unabashedly quirky. (One wore a fur-lined aviator's cap and goggles when I visited.) Anybody can borrow books for a $12 yearly subscription fee, or about the cost of two paperbacks. Best of all, if you join, you never need to be alone again. The MIT Science Fiction Society, which runs the library, meets Friday nights at 5:30. Meetings are called to order with a gigantic wrench, and liberal quantities of junk food are consumed.

For part two of your campus adventure, hop over to the MIT Museum, where you can see the witty and pointless machinery of Arthur Ganson, which includes a sculpture with 12 sets of rotating, cumulatively reducing gears (the last one is embedded in concrete). Kismet, the gremlin-like robot with the big eyes and pointy ears that's trained to mimic human emotions, was created by MIT scientists who worked for years figuring out what, exactly, makes a machine cute. You can also view the iconic Harold Edgerton photo of the bullet exploding the apple. And check out the museum's Holography Collection; the ongoing exhibition, Holography: The Light Fantastic, displays 23 historical examples of the form, including a three-dimensional image of a 2,000-year-old man discovered in an English bog that was used as an educational aid, and works by renowned holographic artists.

MIT Science Fiction Society Library, MIT Student Center, Fourth Floor, 84 Mass. Ave., Cambridge. Hours are irregular. Check http://web.mit.edu/~mitsfs for information. E-mail: mitsfs@mit.edu.

The library of MIT's Science Fiction Society doesn't fit the classic image, and neither do the librarians.

WHERE THE BRAHMIN BROWSED

Step through the massive padded doors of the Boston Athenaeum and you land in the middle of an Edith Wharton novel. The Athenaeum, Boston's oldest private library, was established in 1807 by a group of Boston gentlemen, among them the renowned Boston surgeon John Collins Warren. Portraits by John Singer Sargent and Gilbert Stuart hang downstairs, and the high-ceilinged galleries are padded with lush oriental carpets and adorned with marble busts.

For bibliophiles with esoteric tastes, the Athenaeum is hog heaven. The collections include a trove of imprints from the Confederate states. After the Civil War, library committee member Francis Parkman (a nephew of the George Parkman who met his unfortunate demise in that nasty mastodon business at Harvard), funded a mission to the Confederate states to preserve publications, including the collection of a Richmond, Va., newspaper documenting the Civil War up through that city's evacuation in April 1865. You can pull from the Athenaeum's stacks books like Henry Watson's 1852 Nights in a Block-House, or Sketches of Border Life: Embracing Adventures Among the Indians. There are the papers of P.T. Barnum, a collection of documents in Indian languages, Gypsy literature, and books on alchemy and chemistry. Perhaps most famously, the Athenaeum houses the memoirs of a 19th-century highwayman bound in his own skin. (You can see the book at the Athenaeum and also read the text on its Web site.) It also owns George Washington's personal library of military histories and tracts on sheep farming.

Associate membership is $100 a year for those 40 and younger ($200 thereafter) and includes talks and wine-and-cheese social events. Members can take Wednesday afternoon tea October through May in the gracious rooms downstairs. The schedule for the literary lecture series can be found on the Web. (Colson Whitehead, whose 1999 novel The Intuitionist wowed critics, gave a talk recently.) Associate members can attend the monthly salon and edify their minds with discussion of culture, society and politics. Salon topics in coming months address the seven deadly sins—at the December 14 discussion, participants will muse on Gluttony (vs. Temperance), and in January will talk about Anger (vs. Kindness)—and refreshments are provided.

Keeping true to the city's Puritan traditions, the well-furnished children's library overlooks the headstones in the Granary Burial Ground. After all, morbid imaginations are best nourished young.

10½ Beacon St., Boston. Mon., 9 am–8 pm; Tue.–Fri., 9 am–5:30 pm; Sat. 9 am–4 pm (hours from September through May). Tours Wednesdays at noon. Art and architecture tours Tuesdays and Thursdays, 3 pm (reservations required). 617-227-0270. www.bostonathenaeum.org.

MUMMY DEAREST

Padihershef, a 2,500-year-old mummy, has presided over the Ether Dome, Massachusetts General Hospital's old operating amphitheater since he was abducted from his tomb by grave snatchers and acquired by MGH in 1823. Publically dissected by John Collins Warren (mummy unrollings were fashionable in 19th-century Boston), Padihershef, distinguished by a fabulous set of teeth, had enough star power to be sent on a fund-raising tour around America, garnering $1,500 for MGH at a quarter a head.

In 1846, the mummy witnessed the first public demonstration of ether for anesthesia in surgery. Warren performed that operation as well (his original ether inhaler is part of the Warren Collection at the Countway Medical Library). A giant portrait hung on the Ether Dome wall shows the attending physicians in their muttonchop whiskers, frock coats and bow ties.

The Ether Dome is open to the public 9 am to 8 pm daily. If the door is locked, buzz hospital security to let you in. It's best to visit during daylight hours.

55 Fruit St., Boston. Daily, 9 am–8 pm.

FINE SPECIMENS

On the fifth floor of the Countway Library of Medicine at Harvard Medical School's Longwood campus, you can inspect Dr. John Collins Warren's personal collection of medical curiosities. Born two years after the Declaration of Independence was signed, Warren taught anatomy and surgery at the school and worked as a surgeon at Massachusetts General Hospital. He was also a founder of the New England Journal of Medicine and was a proponent of the temperance movement.

The Warren Anatomical Museum contains some 13,000 specimens. Probably most famous is the skull of Phineas Gage, who made a curious contribution to early brain research. Gage was working on the railroad in Vermont in the 1840s when a tamping iron was blown straight through his head, landing several yards away. Amazingly, Gage remained lucid and could converse with his doctor. He went home after10 weeks of treatment, but his personality had radically changed. Formerly a friendly fellow, he became distinctly disagreeable; he could no longer plan and could work only odd jobs (including a stint exhibiting himself at the Barnum Museum in New York). Gage died in 1860, but in 1867 his body was exhumed, and his skull was acquired by the doctor who had treated him. It's unclear if Gage willingly donated the skull to science.

The museum also contains the Johann Gaspar Spurzheim Phrenological Collection—an artifact from the days when some believed that intelligence and personality were determined by the shape of the skull—as well as the Oliver Wendell Holmes microscope collection, plus photographs, paintings, drawings, medical instruments and machines, and anatomical models from the early days of medicine. You need to make an appointment to see the core collection, but some items are on display to the casual browser.

the science of STAYING WARM

DON'T LET THE COLD WEATHER FREEZE YOU OUT OF WINTER FUN.

BY WENDY HOLT

ILLUSTRATIONS BY BEEGEE TOLPA

Each fall, rumors and speculation fly regarding the upcoming winter. How much snow will the gods toss on New England this year? Last December, one of the whitest on record, delivered a major snowstorm in its first week, coating Boston with 17 inches. In a city that averages 33 inches per year, according to the National Weather Service, that sounds like an awful lot for one month. Can we expect more of the same this winter? The Old Farmer's Almanac (whose weather predictions my grandfather, a farmer, always swore by) projects that we'll see "near or above normal" snowfall in the Northeast. Many of us love winter's first flurries, but the Boston cold really has a way of getting under your skin. Here are a few tips for beating that Yankee chill.

DRESS LIKE AN ONION

The key to staying warm is layering. "In the past 10 years, layering has become the way to go," says David Teufel of L.L. Bean, the popular New England shop devoted to outfitting people with outdoor gear. Layers trap the warm air from our bodies, adding extra insulation between clothing and keeping us snug.

"Everything you've heard about layering being good is true," confirms Dr. Michael Sawka of the U.S. Army Research Institute of Environmental Medicine, in Natick. If anyone should know, it's Sawka, whose institute studies how people's bodies react in extreme hot and cold environments. The other advantage to layering is that it allows a "wicking effect," as people in the "cold-know" like to say. To stay warm, we need to keep dry, but our bodies naturally give off moisture. Layers allow that moisture to travel up and away from the skin. Rob Burbank, public affairs director of the Appalachian Mountain Club (AMC), points out that when you're active, you can also add or "peel away" a layer as needed, hence the "dress like an onion" motto. Dr. Michelle Finkel, an attending ER physician at Mass. General Hospital who treats hypothermia, confirms that "the key is wearing appropriate clothing, lots of layers."

So what types of clothing do the experts recommend? Start with your long underwear, but forget the cotton long johns you sported as a kid on winter mornings. Cotton should be avoided says Teufel, even for socks. Cotton absorbs moisture, trapping wet perspiration and chilling you unnecessarily. Instead, try a synthetic fiber, like polyester (or polypropylene), which is good at wicking moisture. Next, a thin polyester fleece typically makes a good midlayer and is well suited to aerobic activities like cross-country skiing or ice skating. Your final, third layer depends on the weather conditions. If you'll be heading out for a winter saunter, a layered Gore-Tex parka or a down-fill jacket is a good option. For a day of skiing, Thinsulate or a waterproof down-fill jacket that's not too bulky works well. All of our experts stressed the importance of having an outer shell that's both waterproof and windproof.

GET DOWN

Down, that fluffy plumage, still reigns as the king of warmth. That's because it has what Teufel describes as "loft," or air space. "It wraps warm air around you, and you're surrounded by heat," he says. It's also why anything made of down—jackets, sleeping bags, comforters—is so toasty. Still, Teufel admits that while down is warmer than a synthetic fill like Thinsulate, it can be "more bulky, so it's a trade-off." Down also significantly loses its warming effect when it gets wet. Thinsulate is "more compact and dries more easily. It's become the standard alternative," according to Teufel. While some outfitters now offer newly sleek down jackets, Thinsulate remains an appealing option if your fashion sense steers you away from coats that turn you into a puffy marshmallow.

Interestingly, the old standard, scratchy wool, is making a comeback in winter fashion and warmth. "Wool's great," says Teufel. "It's a survival fabric. The best thing about wool is that even when it gets wet, it keeps you warm. [Unlike with down,] the loft is still there."

As for those fleece jackets that abound in a kaleidoscope of colors, apparently they really do break the chill. Fleece, essentially spun polyester, is effective because of its nap, the nubby part that traps air around us. And what about those fleece vests? They're good for maintaining your core temperature but still provide mobility for outdoor adventures, says Burbank. These days you can even buy "windblock fleece," which Teufel says allows breathability from the inside, but doesn't let in wind. Very cool—or should we say, very warm?

COLD FEET? PUT ON YOUR HAT

We've all heard that you lose the majority of heat through your head, but that theory turns out to be a bit misleading. True, when the rest of you is bundled up, the most heat will escape through your head. But that's not because the head serves as a prime area for heat loss. "The more insulation you have, the more heat you conserve," explains Sawka. "The main reason [the head] is important is that we usually don't cover it." So, what to wear on your top? A plain old wool hat works just fine for kicking around town. For especially blustery Boston days, a fleece cap with built-in wind resistance is ideal. And as for those feet? Layering your socks can further help you stay cozy, right down to your toes.

MITTENS TRUMP GLOVES

While gloves may be more fashionable than mittens, mittens win the warmth contest hands down. It might not make sense intuitively—wouldn't it be better to wrap each finger individually?—but the science prevails. Mittens expose less surface area to the cold and wind, says Sawka, and they also trap more air inside, providing further insulation. A mitten with a synthetic fleece inner covered by a breathable waterproof shell is best, says Burbank. And, yes, those little hand warmers that you can buy for under two dollars at any sports shop really do work. Drop them in your pocket or the tip of your boot, and they'll emit heat for six to eight hours. They're perfect for football or ice hockey viewing.

SET ASIDE THE HOT TODDY

Alcohol may a best friend make at a football game, but it's best to leave it at home on a cold day. While "a nip" may flush your cheeks and make you feel warmer at first, in fact it can hinder your "ability to perceive cold," explains Dr. John Castellani, also from the army's Research Institute of Environmental Medicine. Under normal conditions, when you're cold, blood vessels in the skin constrict. This minimizes heat loss and sends more blood to the body's core, protecting vital organs like the heart, brain and lungs. Alcohol can work against this built-in warming trick; it encourages blood flow away from our core and can lead to increased heat loss, says Dr. Gian Corrado, a Boston physician. Too much alcohol can also lower your glucose levels, inhibiting your ability to shiver (shivering is a heat-generating mechanism for our bodies).

On the other hand, "when you have hot foods, like tea or soup," explains Dr. Ann Yelmokas McDermott, a nutrition scientist at Tufts University, "they do help to raise your body's core temperature." Eating plenty of foods high in carbohydrates (like trail mix) and good fats (like nuts) is also important for aerobic activity in the cold. You need the calories to stoke your body's furnace. And don't forget to drink plenty of water, something that's easy to do in frigid weather. "Figure on at least two quarts per person per day" while hiking, says Rob Burbank.

WATCH OUT FOR THE "UMBLES"

If you're thinking of traveling beyond the city limits for serious outdoor adventuring, you'll want to make sure you can spot the first signs of hypothermia, such as shivering vigorously and experiencing a decrease in sensation. "People can get confused and dizzy too," says MGH's Finkel. Inveterate hiker Burbank describes it as a case of "the umbles: fumble, mumble, grumble, stumble, tumble." Watch out for signs of confusion, irritability and loss of fine motor control, like the ability to zip up a jacket. Burbank also cautions to bear in mind that "hiking distances are, in effect, longer in the winter because the weather will slow you down." The AMC offers courses on beginner cross-country skiing, winter first aid, snow-shelter building, and even avalanche awareness and rescue. It's worth checking out their Web site (www.outdoors.org) for tailored lists of gear and tips for winter adventuring.

And if all else fails, may we recommend cozying up next to the fire with a good book, a cup of hot cocoa, and your significant other to stave off the chill till...well, till the snow starts to melt outside your window. iB

HEY! I LIVED HERE ONCE

Cape Encounters*, by Dan Gordon and Gary Joseph, reports "real" ghost encounters on Cape Cod.

The many people in this book who claim to have seen, heard, even been kissed by intruders from the gauzy past in their Cape Cod houses seem remarkably sane. If anything, they have an almost Puritan practicality that would suggest they'd never believe in such things as ghosts. The stair-tromping, door-unlocking, window-opening visitors described in these exciting, uncanny stories are mostly sympathetic, as are the visitees. One of the spirits appears, in a ghostly millisecond, looking like Lincoln in a big black hat (no ordinary Cape hoodlum!). Another, much to the terror of a baby-sitter, manages to open all the sliding glass doors of a huge mansion at once. As if yoo-hooing across time to current inhabitants of "their" house weren't enough, one ghost defied the indignity of burial by moving a huge gravestone—no crowbar marks and no telltale signs of teen vandalism, like beer cans, were found. Moreover it was estimated that moving it would've taken six breathing people. Objects in one attic of an empty house were shifted from one side to the other. And some ghosts "speak" in the medium of perfume—or cigar smoke. Now that's the past!

YOU'VE GOT A FRIEND

The Wellness Community, at 1039 Chestnut St., in Newton Upper Falls (617-332-1919), offers many kinds of support to people with cancer and their families, caregivers and survivors. On December 9, volunteers are needed to help prepare gift baskets.

Founded 22 years ago by a doctor whose wife had cancer, the Wellness Community is designed to offer a personal connection that medical personnel can't always provide. In a safe and comfy environment—an important antidote to the antiseptic fluorescence of hospitals—people join therapist-run support groups. Here, patients are returned to relieving ordinariness by being called "participants." Not a health club, not a medical clinic, it's a place where participants find comfort with fellow travelers on their unchosen journey and can, so to speak, let their no-hair down. The center's driving spirit is the belief that one can become an active player in the whole experience, giving and getting help and hope, while also countering the worry that cancer must be a death sentence. Tears, laughter and the freedom from isolation in a scary time are among the benefits. As one woman put it, "I could be 100 percent myself there, especially on bad days, without worrying about hurting or burdening my family. I couldn't have gotten through cancer without this place." The Wellness Community offers twice-weekly orientation meetings, education, art, singing, tai chi and yoga—and it's all free.

SWEET AND SAVORY, RUSTIC AND ROSEMARY-TINGED

Toscanini and Sons, at 406 Washington St., Somerville, replaces the old Panini and adds new treats. They do catering too.

This sometimes-buzzing, often-peaceful corner spot—bakery, ice cream parlor and café—represents continuity in flux, and crosstown marketing too. Toscanini and Sons is located in the spot formerly inhabited by Panini and is still imbued with that café's European flavor. The shop imports from Central Square the high-class ice cream of Toscanini. Its savory offerings include sandwiches on substantial slices of crusty bread. There's La Bella Mozzarella, with homemade pickle pesto; that salty old Jewish New York favorite, the reuben with pastrami; and, shades-of-childhood, egg salad containing fresh peas. Their chicken salad sandwiches also crunch in red grapes, pecans, apples, parsley and mayonnaise. Yet another has black olive tapenade, a harder cheese called ricotta salata with what owner Greta describes as "really nice tangy flavor," and roasted tomatoes. Toscanini's focaccia-crusted pizza slices have subtly autumnal toppings like eggplant, caramelized onions, capers, tomato and black olives; frittatas follow suit. After a leisurely, literary visit (people come and read books here), take home one of their rustic breads made daily: sourdough, potato and plain white rounds with just a bit of whole wheat. Toscanini's Italian-style ice cream, rich with egg yolk and beautifully creamy, comes in subtle, unusual flavors, like nocciola, burnt caramel, gingersnap molasses and mocha almond chip.

TWO TIMING

THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN's Year End Double Issue is out on the streets longer than our other issues. By any measure, 2004 was a remarkable year in Beantown. Ezra Dyer reminds us what made the past 12 months memorable, with The Year in Review. The editors declare what's hot and what's not for 2005 in The IMPROPER's second annual In and Out list. If you're tired of the same old eggnog and mistletoe gatherings that abound around the holidays, the IMPROPER can help with ways to organize unique, activity-oriented parties from handbag designing to golf lessons. To wrap up the year in style, we'll bring you everything you ever needed to know about buying a tuxedo (or updating the one you have) and elegant dressing for the holidays' most fabulous parties. We also look at the most unusual trends to hit our city this year, as well as a few strange fads that Bostonians wisely rejected.

So why not make it a double?

REVIEW

SPINNING THE 33

33 has ditched its schizophrenic menu; now it just needs to make its flashes of excellence more consistent.

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY BERTA A. DANIELS

If at first you don't succeed..." This cliché sprang to mind as I embarked on a review of 33 Restaurant & Lounge. This chic restaurant and nightspot was launched in 2002 without a clearly defined culinary vision. It had initially recruited one of the best food people in Greater Boston, Charles Draghi, to re-create the refined Italian fare he had produced with such success at Marcuccio's in the North End, but at the same time it proceeded on a parallel track, featuring French cuisine in equal measure. This muddled concept didn't work, and in an early visit I found the results less than satisfactory. Apparently I was not alone, and eventually the bifurcated approach was abandoned.

Earlier this year, 33 brought in chef Anthony Dawodu to run the kitchen. Dawodu trained in London, served a stint as saucier at the Park Lane Hilton, and eventually ended up at Boston's Four Seasons, where he assumed increasing responsibility first at Aujourd'hui and then at the Bristol Lounge. Well traveled, curious and adventurous about cuisine, and with a rich heritage reaching back to the Caribbean and West Africa, Dawodu brings great energy and enthusiasm to his new post. So far, the results, while mixed, show great promise.

Ensconced on Stanhope Street, which separates the South End from the Back Bay, 33 caters to a young crowd of merrymakers. To reach its dimly lit downstairs cocktail lounge and cabaret, you walk down a flight of stairs bathed in colored lights that continuously move slowly across the spectrum from red to yellow, green, blue, and violet and back again. The same effect is created on the long bar that bisects the main dining room. Mini-globe light fixtures hang from a ceiling of wooden slats, while poster-size photographs and thin, flat speakers for the sound system cover much of the exposed brick walls. A small carafe containing a single rose adorns each table.

A first-rate tapenade, surrounded by a small pool of flavorful, aromatic extra virgin olive oil, accompanies 33's bread, which included good, crusty French baguettes and somewhat dry, undistinguished focaccia. The minor inconsistency of the bread mirrored the inconsistency of the kitchen generally. Like the little girl with the curl on the middle of her forehead, when it was good it was very very good, and when it was bad it was horrid. Fortunately, the former outweighed the latter.

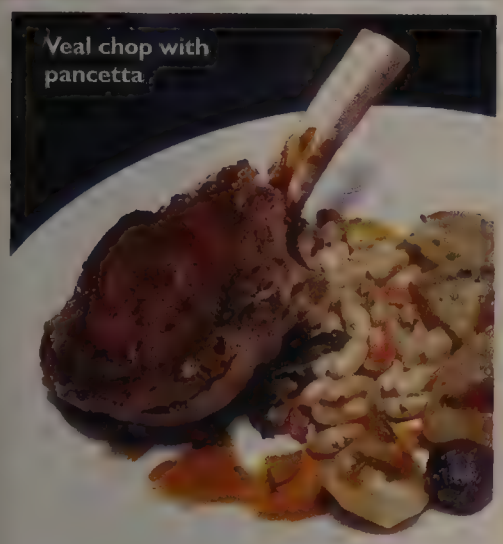
I'll start with the very, very good. Lobster risotto, which the kitchen made available in an appetizer-size half portion ($11), rang the bell. Moist, creamy, and flavorful, with morsels of delicate, sweet lobster, the risotto included thin slices of poached leek and salsify, which added their subtle, mildly savory flavor. While my wife enjoyed the risotto, I struggled to understand how my appetizer, sesame-crusted soft-shell crab (part of the $33 fixed-price three-course dinner) could have come out of the same kitchen. Seldom have I endured a preparation quite as disagreeable. While this crustacean had been crusted at one time during its preparation, by the time it reached the table it was soggy. A pathetic garnish of tofu cubes, some white, some breaded and fried, shared the bowl with the unhappy crustacean, a hard carrot, soft peas and indifferent spinach.

Somewhere in between the excellent risotto and abysmal crab, 33's Sonoma seared foie gras with braised short ribs and parsnip puree ($14) was enjoyable up to but not including the foie gras itself. That had been coated in crushed almonds and fried crisp, totally obscuring its flavor and texture. Indeed, foie gras' heavenly, buttery texture constitutes one of the delicacy's major attractions, and 33's preparation squandered that texture while overwhelming the sweet, rich flavor that constitutes foie gras' other principal attraction. Despite the mishandling of the foie gras, the tender, full-flavored, boneless short ribs and mellow pureed parsnip studded with nuggets of apple that arrived beneath it almost rescued the dish.

Often restaurants produce excellent appetizers only to stumble with their main courses. At 33 the main courses were the stars, and of the four I sampled, three were superlative and only one didn't measure up. The last mentioned, couscous-crusted salmon ($23), suffered from a conceptual misstep not dissimilar to the one afflicting the foie gras. On the three recent evenings I visited, 33's kitchen seemed enamored of "crusted" preparations. But what's the point of a couscous crust? Why not spaghetti crust or linguini crust? Crusted starches may have their place—potato crusted preparations abound—but turning pasta into a crust adds nothing to a dish, and it clearly added nothing to the salmon; it didn't even succeed in keeping parts of it from being dried out. The light red sauce that surrounded—indeed, inundated—the salmon contributed little of merit; ditto the undercooked brussels sprout quarters and cubes of chayote squash. The final ingredient of the dish, baby spinach, on the other hand, was delicious, but there was not much of it.



33's kitchen performed superbly on the poultry and meat side of the menu. Its Long Island duck breast with leg confit ($27) took top honors. The succulent breast, rare as ordered, included a thin layer of rich, pleasantly salty skin. The texture contrast between the resilient yet tender breast and the characteristic fall-off-the-bone texture of the leg confit, as well as the first-rate, mildly and pleasantly gamy flavor shared by breast and leg, increased the bird's appeal. A veal chop ($28) was thick, juicy and tender, a magnificent slab of meat, fully the peer of veal chops fetching a substantially higher price at other area restaurants. Its garnish of white beans, carrots, pearl onions, spinach and roasted wedges of potatoes made this a substantial, varied, toothsome ensemble. Loin of lamb (the main course on the $33 fixed-price dinner menu) replicated the superb texture of the veal, tender and juicy. The strong, but not too strong, flavor of lamb was nicely suited to our bottle of 1998 Bergerac ($25), an austere but well structured wine containing classic grapes of the South of France: Cabernet Franc Mourvedre, and Carignane.

Desserts at 33 varied from an unexceptional crème brûlée (included on the fixed price dinner menu) with decent flavor and texture and a properly caramelized shell, to the astoundingly good warm chocolate cake ($9), among the best exemplars of that au courant fixture on Boston area menus I have encountered. Warm, runny, chocolate encased in moist cake supported by a slice of mellow, sweet pear terrine and garnished with a scoop of Tahitian-Tonkinese vanilla ice cream and crème anglaise, it formed a multifaceted treat that satisfied the chocolate craving while delivering far more.

With an accomplished chef like Anthony Dawodu on board, I'm confident the missteps by 33's kitchen will become rarer, and that preparations as good as the duck, veal chop, lamb loin, and risotto will set the standard. I'm not so sure, however, about 33's service, which on two of my three visits was disorganized and slipshod. One could not but applaud the earnestness of its young waitstaff, but they appeared to lack training, discipline and supervision. Dining alone one night, I was seated at a table for four, and the person who seated me neglected to clear the three other place settings. When another person returned to do that, she also removed my bread plate. A well run restaurant with professional, well organized, and vigilant direction and supervision is the first step toward customer satisfaction. Great service cannot rescue bad food, but the converse is unfortunately true: Substandard service can diminish the handiwork of the most talented of chefs. Chef Dawodu has shown that he can produce first rate food. It would be a shame if he were subverted by the front of the house. iB

Table-Hopping

Familiar faces, new places...

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

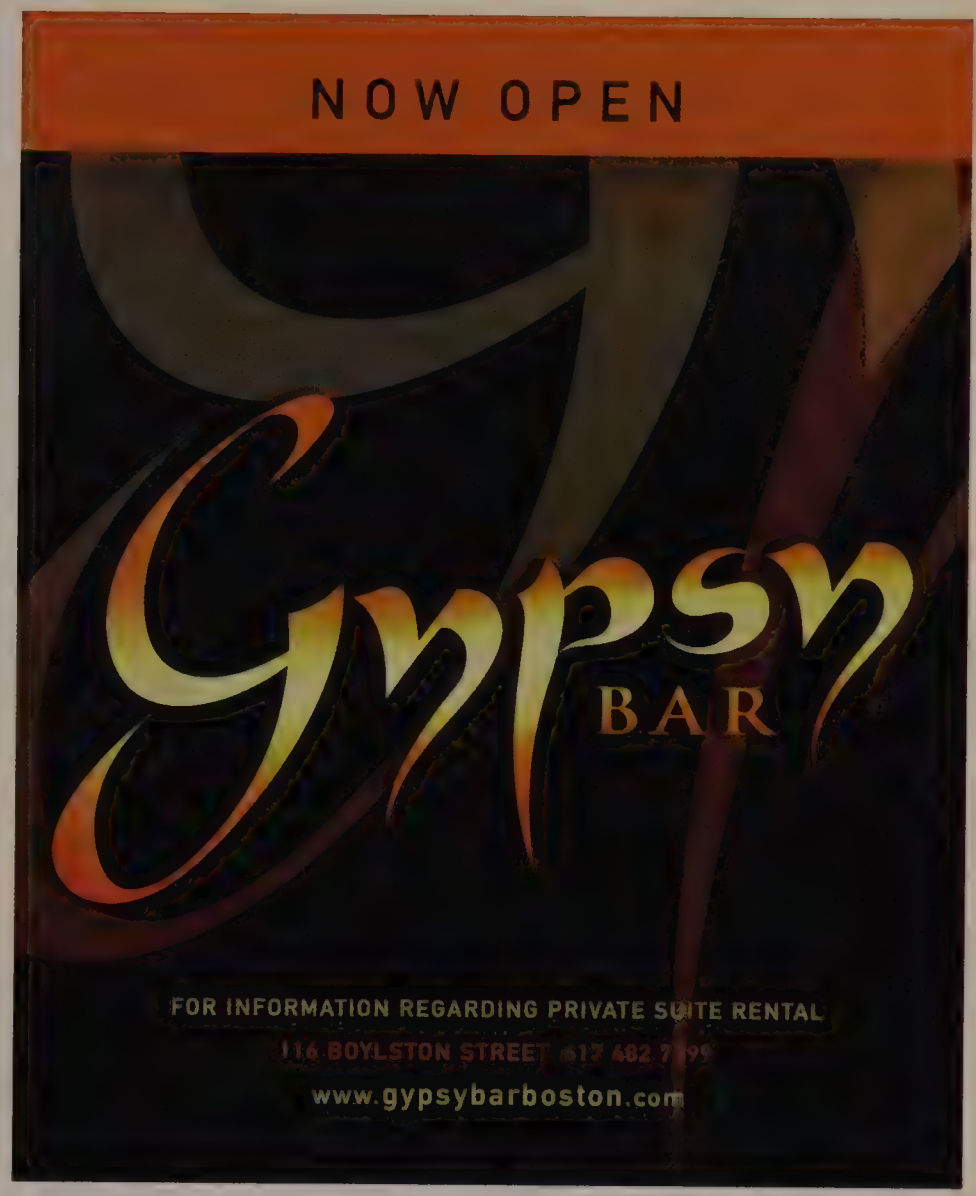
Since it opened about a year ago, Union Bar & Grille has hit all the right notes in establishing its position as a solid success on Washington Street in the South End. Now, Jeffrey Iovino has joined the mix as general manager. Most recently general manager of Teatro, which he helped open in January 2003, Iovino was formerly an assistant general manager at Mistral. That's where he met manager Jennifer Gower, who is now his new bride. Congratulations on both your unions!

Jeffrey Iovino, former general manager of Teatro, is now at the head of the house at Union.

SECOND COURSE

The pasta is prologue: When we heard that Guy Neil, Via Matta's general manager and a longtime friend of chef Michael Schlow, had left his post to become general manager at Atlantic Fish Company, we wondered why he'd give up such a cool job. Well, cool jobs demand long hours and late hours, and although the friendship remains solidly intact—"we're still family," says Neil, pointing out that Schlow is his son's godfather—Neil has more time for his own family now. "I've been putting my kids to bed three nights a week," he says. Besides, he adds, Atlantic Fish Company is part of Back Bay Restaurant Group, "a company that's been around for 30 years and is still growing. I'm very excited [about the career move]." Meanwhile, back at Via Matta, Scott Fraley is the new general manager. Fraley was formerly wine director at Radius.

More movement: Medhi Barrabah, whose background includes a stint at Mantra, is the new chef at Sophia's. He's been promoted from line cook to take over the kitchen from Jeff Fournier, who is now executive chef at the new Metropolitan Club and Bar in Chestnut Hill. Icarus chef/owner Chris Douglass is making slow but steady progress on his forthcoming Dorchester eatery.



Everything old is (cobalt) blue again: The Dining Room at the Ritz Carlton has been named one of only six four-star restaurants in Massachusetts by the 2005 Mobil Travel Guide. Only 140 restaurants throughout the United States and Canada earn this honor, so kudos to executive chef Tony Esnault and manager/sommelier Peter Greerty...

Mantra is reincarnating some favorite dishes from its earliest menus, including the truly memorable spice-crusted tuna with eggplant caviar, arugula and a pinot noir reduction. Co-chefs Ernie Quinones and Philip Carolan have also whipped up a new bar menu with mega-nibbles such as coal-smoked steak tartare with black truffles, and Kobe beef miniburgers with roasted-garlic aioli and rassam-spiced pommes frites...Trumpet mushrooms? The Spinnazola Foundation Gala Festival of Food and Wine will celebrate its 20th annual event with a special flourish on January 28 at the Seaport World Trade Center: Keith Lockhart and the Boston Pops will perform a specially commissioned musical work. Perhaps a nice piece of bass with piccolo on the side... iB

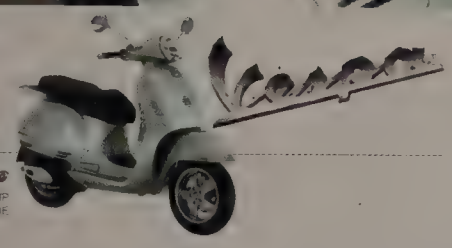
SOUS SWEET

Jamie Bissonette



One of the many lessons we've learned from cliches over the years is that two heads are always better than one, but what about four chefs? Find out on December 7, when Tremont 647 executive chef Jamie Bissonette hosts Sous Chef Night, where four sous chefs—locals Jimmy Whelen of Tremont 647, Jason Lord of the East Coast Grill, and Drew Greer of Boston's Ate Seasons Restaurant Group, plus Ed Cotton Jr. from Daniel Boulud Bistro Modern in New York City—combine their talents for a special dining event.

The night begins with a 6 pm cocktail reception featuring appetizers created by the chefs and suggestions for beverages that best complement the dishes. A four-course sit-down dinner follows, with each chef preparing a course.

Admission is $45 and includes one drink at the reception, although a cash bar is available all night. Reservations are strongly recommended.

WINE

To Your Health?

BY SANDY BLOCK, M.W.

It puts hair on your chest, cures the common cold, is good for your sex life and can even make nerds popular. What's this magic elixir? Wine, of course. If it seems to you that there's a generalized sense of euphoria afoot concerning the beneficial effects of wine drinking, you're right. So it's time to look at the facts. But first let's establish something. The worst reason to drink wine is because you think it's good for you. Wine may be many things, most of them wonderful, but it's not medicine. If you don't enjoy it, there are plenty of other less controversial "health foods" out there.

The whole relationship between wine drinking and health is so shrouded in hype and confusion that it's worth disentangling. By now we all probably know that medical research has correlated moderate wine consumption, however that's defined, with greater longevity as compared to abstinence or heavy wine drinking. But what's less well known is that moderate intake of beer and spirits are also related to lower overall mortality rates, and that once you cross over the line into heavy alcohol consumption in any form your chances of dying early shoot up dramatically. The rub is that it's impossible to specify precisely what amount is "moderate" for any one person. Everyone's got different body chemistry, and an appropriate amount of wine for one individual may prove toxic to another. So it's always better to err on the side of caution.

What specific effect does alcohol have on the body? The most beneficial appears to be its tendency to increase the amount of so-called good cholesterol (HDL) that the body manufactures and decrease the level of bad, artery-clogging cholesterol (LDL) in the bloodstream. It also aids in thinning the blood and reducing the risk of clotting. An additional health benefit often attributed to wine is that it contains powerful antioxidants that protect against a range of vascular diseases. The effect has been noted for white wine as well as for red. And moderate wine drinkers tend to have lower blood pressure, lower rates of both heart disease and diabetes, and less risk of stroke. So far so good.

There are risks as well, most of them associated with crossing the invisible line into heavy drinking. The observed benefits, one should also note, are much stronger for people in their forties and older; at this point research has established only vague evidence of the health benefits of moderate wine drinking for younger consumers. And along with the many studies that have suggested correlations between wine drinking with lower risks of cancer overall, at least one disturbing report has associated even moderate consumption of alcohol with a slightly higher risk of younger women developing breast cancer. Researchers are quick to point out that this increased risk is far outweighed by the massive vascular benefits. On the other side of the coin, the much-ballyhooed mandatory wine label warning against pregnant women drinking because it can lead to increased risk of fetal alcohol syndrome, is surely overstated. Virtually all known cases of this syndrome have involved women who have chronic problems with alcohol abuse.

One of the interesting facets of the research that's been done focuses on the regularity of consumption. It turns out that people who drink moderate amounts of wine—or liquor or beer— five to seven days per week have a much lower risk of heart disease than binge drinkers who consume comparable quantities but over a shorter period. Binge drinking, of wine or anything else, poses a definite health risk. But since studies have suggested that many of the protective effects of wine consumption are transient, lasting less than 24 hours, the most positive results occur among those who drink small quantities of wine every day.

This is all useful information, but why does none of it appear on the label of a wine bottle? Why is the only message a compulsory warning that wine drinking may be detrimental to your health? The warning is a holdover from the days when any form of alcohol was treated as an evil that one must just say no to. But it no longer squares with the facts as we know them today, and certainly has the potential for being misleading. In fact, it's illegal for wine producers to provide positive statements about the proven health benefits of wine. This is largely because of the fear of litigation. Any general claims made could provide fodder for legal action, particularly since there are so many people who can't tolerate alcohol and shouldn't drink under any circumstances.

So the general feel-good message that "drinking is good for you" is just as dangerous as suppressing information about the real benefits. It all depends on your individual circumstances. And no one should assume that moderate wine consumption shows the positive effects with which it's correlated in isolation from other lifestyle choices. In other words, in the absence of a healthy diet, regular excess and reduced levels of stress in your life, you can't simply drink wine and expect that it will protect you. IB

Comedy: Hail to the Ding

Stand-up stalwart Jimmy Tingle celebrates the second anniversary of his Off Broadway Theater in Somerville by bringing in some long-time comedian cohorts for a Ding Ho Reunion show. The four-week celebration features local and national stars who got their start at Inman Square's now defunct Ding Ho Chinese restaurant/comedy club. Tingle himself hosts all the performances, and he'll reflect on the legacy of the Ding, which began hosting comedians in the summer of 1979 when aspiring comic Barry Crimmins pestered the owners to let him put on shows. A slew of big-name comedians—including Steven Wright, Lenny Clarke, Bobcat Goldthwait, Paula Poundstone and Denis Leary—got their start there. And many favorites from the Ding Ho days are coming back to perform during the reunion, among them Crimmins, Teddy Bergeron, Bill Campbell, Mike Donovan, Jack Gallagher, Don Gavin, Tom Gilmore, DJ Hazard, Brian Kiley, Chance Langton and Bob Siebel. Steve Sweeney will also pop in to do some skits. Thursdays through Sundays, 7:30 pm. $25. 255 Elm St., Somerville (617-591-1616). www.jtoffbroadway.com.

THROUGHOUT DECEMBER

Music and Performing Arts: 'Tis the Season

It's holiday time, and theater audiences around the city are seeing red...and green. Sugar plum fairies cavort in Boston Ballet and Jose Mateo's productions of The Nutcracker. The Radio City Rockettes kick into town with their Christmas Spectacular. Gloucester Stage Company brings back Babes in Toyland, and perennial faves Black Nativity and the Christmas Revels are at it again. Where the Dickens is Tiny Tim? He and the ghosts of Christmas are on stage at the Stoneham Theatre and the North Shore Music Theatre. If all this tradition brings out your inner Scrooge, try David Sedaris' Santaland Diaries at Chelsea Theatre Works for a little comic relief. See pages 58 and 64 for performance dates and contact information.

THROUGH DEC. 26

Performing Arts: Men and Women Behaving Badly

What do you get when the woman marries for money and the man strictly for sex? You get a marriage whose high points are drunken debauchery and infidelity—the subject of Englishman John Vanbrugh's 17th-century English play The Provok'd Wife. The comedic social commentary (that's right—it's a comedy) about a dysfunctional couple shocked audiences with its scandalous nature when it was first staged in 1697. Nowadays, it takes a lot more than a rotten marriage to provoke outrage, and audiences usually just find the play funny. British director Mark Wing-Davey's production at the American Repertory Theatre runs through the 26th. At most of the performances, a preplay discussion begins an hour before curtain, and on Saturday nights, December 4, 11 and 18, there's a postshow discussion called Playback. Loeb Drama Center, 64 Brattle St., Cambridge (617-547-8300). $12–$72.

SUN./DEC. 12

CityScope: Teatotallers

Beer drinkers know him as the namesake of their favorite local brew, but historically speaking, Samuel Adams is more closely associated with an herbal beverage: tea. On December 16, 1773, Adams and his fellow patriots made history with the Boston Tea Party. Old South Meeting House, the site of the fiery debate that led to the famous political protest, celebrates the Tea Party's 231st anniversary with its annual reenactment on December 12. WBZ-4 news anchor Jack Williams hosts the mock protest, which features members of Old South's Tea Party Players suited up in Revolutionary garb. Only the first 600 guests gain admission to Old South Meeting House, and if you come clad in historic attire, the $5 fee is waived. 310 Washington St., Boston (617-482-6439). www.oldsouthmeetinghouse.org. 5:30–7:30 pm. $5.

Members of klezmer rock band Golem

Cityscope: Oy Vey

Just when you thought there weren't enough wacky Hanukkah-related wingdings to go to this holiday season, one comes along that tops them all. There are more klezmer ditties than you can shake a menorah at when Hot Latkas comes to town. The holiday celebration at the Paradise with comedy, music, burlesque and just a hint of vaudeville features two New York acts: Golem and Nice Jewish Girls Gone Bad. The sassy lasses of Nice Jewish Girls Gone Bad perform a very unkosher show indeed: a vaudeville-meets-rock-meets-standup routine. Six-member band Golem takes traditional klezmer sounds and adds an edgy twist of rock. The show is hosted by comedian/singer the Goddess Perlman. Paradise Lounge, 969 Comm. Ave., Boston (617-562-8814). 9 pm. $15.

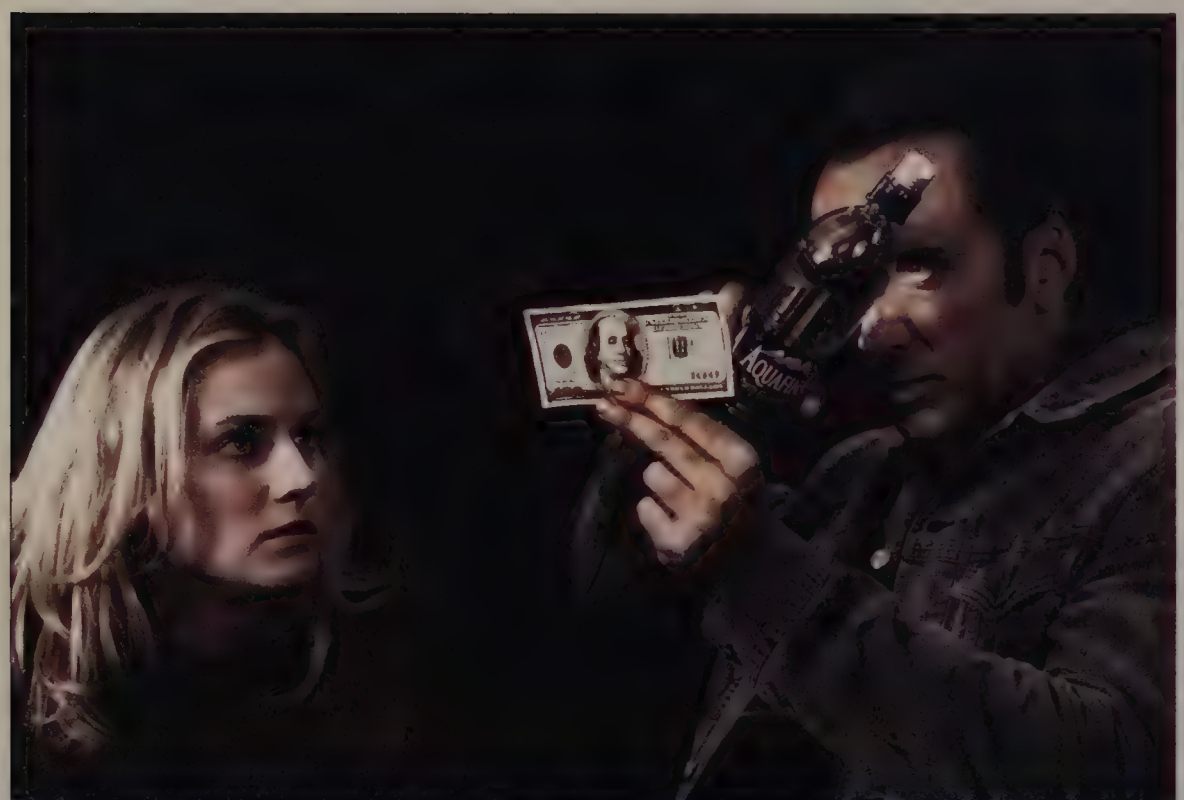
Bruckheimer Lite

National Treasure offers no rewards.



BY PAUL SHERMAN

Dang. After Trey Parker and Matt Stone's dead-on parody of Jerry Bruckheimer's action monstrosities in Team America, I was ready to laugh my ass off at Bruckheimer's new National Treasure. But what a drag. The gimmicky founding-fathers-hid-a-treasure-and-Nicolas-Cage-is-gonna-find-it action-thriller from the producer of such obnoxious ordeals as Armageddon, Bad Boys and Pearl Harbor isn't even bad enough to be good. It's just mediocre and forgettable.

I guess the tip-off should have been that Walt Disney Pictures, not the studio's more adult Touchstone division, is releasing National Treasure. Plus, it's rated PG. Let's face it, there are only so many buildings and people you can blow up with no regard for human life in a Disney PG movie. There are plenty more tips that this movie might be a trip to Dullsville. Just look at the writers: Jim Kouf, whose past films include Taxi, Snow Dogs and Operation Dumbo Drop; and the team of Cormac and Marianne Wibberley, who were responsible for I Spy and Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle (no more TV privileges for you two). All those movies have scripts that not only shouldn't have been filmed, they should have been buried, preferably in kitty litter.

If the signs for a mundane multiplex movie were there, why couldn't Nicolas Cage see them? Cage had success with Bruckheimer in the one-two punch of Con Air and The Rock, but it was big, dull movies like Bruckheimer's later Gone in 60 Seconds and John Woo's Windtalkers that sent Cage's career into a tailspin before it righted with the more idiosyncratic Adaptation and Matchstick Men. A Nicolas Cage character without neuroses is like a baseball player without a bat. He's got nothing to work with. Compared to something like Adaptation, in which Cage immersed himself in a double role, his performance here feels half-hearted, and who can blame him? We simply don't need Nicolas Cage playing heroes like Benjamin Franklin Gates, the National Treasure protagonist who comes from a long line of men who've traced the trail of the reputed treasure that was safeguarded by Freemasons through the centuries and safely socked away by those Masons who signed the Declaration of Independence.

In National Treasure, Cage's Ben and all of the characters take a backseat to their gadgets. Laptops, fiber optic cameras, fingerprint lifters, laser pointers that can heat whatever they're aimed at and the like dominate the action much more than the stick-figure humans who follow the clues from the Arctic Circle to Washington, D.C., Philadelphia and New York City. One character who's given up on believing that there's a treasure keeps complaining that the hunt is an endless pursuit of one clue after another, and he's right. From a sunken British ship lodged in the Arctic ice to the Declaration of Independence to the Franklin Institute to Independence Hall to Wall Street, this is a tedious jigsaw puzzle that's easy to stop caring about.

Diane Kruger and Nicolas Cage try to learn all about the Benjamins in National Treasure.

More to the point, it's hard to start caring about it. With Cage strait-jacketed by a dull role, uncharismatic Diane Kruger (Troy) as the archivist who's his arm candy, all those gadgets and the rushed shifts of locale, National Treasure is much more mechanical than fun. Then again, director Jon Turtletaub's idea of action and comedy is just caricature—he's the guy who gave us 3 Ninjas and Cool Runnings—and the romantic sparks here between Cage and Kruger make the Ben Affleck–Liv Tyler romance in Armageddon seem deep.

National Treasure is not without a few unintentionally silly moments, like when Ben deciphers a cryptic riddle with absolutely none of the panache with which Adam West did the same sort of decoding on Batman, or when the obligatory foreign bad guy (Sean Bean) instructs Ben to "meet me on the flight deck of the USS Intrepid." They're in Philly at the time, so there's no logical reason for them to go to New York to palaver. Yet the thick plot needs to get them there. But such little gaffes do not add up to much entertainment. If you want to see how enjoyable a movie like this could be, find a DVD of Jackie Chan's more imaginative and stylish Armour of God II: Operation Condor. IB

National Treasure ★½

Directed by Jon Turtletaub. Written by Jim Kouf, Marianne Wibberley and Cormac Wibberley. With Nicolas Cage, Diane Kruger, Sean Bean, Justin Bartha, Jon Voight, Harvey Keitel and Christopher Plummer. Rated PG. At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.

tive trying to turn Albert's environmental grou into a PR-friendly front for his chainstore—and fellow client (Mark Wahlberg) obsessed with petro leum consumption. The movie ricochets aroun like a pinball, sometimes distractingly so, but ju about every direction it heads in is hilarious. (A Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Harvar Square and suburbs.)

The Incredibles ★★★
The animation in Pixar's computer-generated movi keeps improving, and this is the first one that's ha the nerve to put humans—albeit semi-abstract on —in the foreground. That's not a problem at all, the animation's ability to portray facial expressions so much better than it was for past Pixar movies which human action was kept to a minimum (like th Toy Story series). Still, this is the first Pixar mov that's merely good, not great. Once again, there's a amazing mesh of voice actors and characters, wit Craig T. Nelson and Holly Hunter playing retire husband-and-wife superheroes forced back into a tion along with their supergifted kids (Sarah Vowe and Spencer Fox). But the story is an awful lot lik Spy Kids, with more emphasis put on the parents, ar for much of the middle section, this is merely a dece animated "big" action movie, with less of a satir twist than Team America. Pixar has raised the bar high that, when taken against other animat movies, The Incredibles is still very creative. But i also disappointing at times and overstretched. (A Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Kinsey ★★★
Scientist Alfred Kinsey became obsessed with r searching the sexual habits of Americans and ha ing his scientific findings replace myth and trad tional morality in shaping people's view
"average" sexual behavior. Bill (Gods a Monsters) Condon's period piece does a fascina
ing job of capturing the fervent work of Kins (Liam Neeson) and showing how his findings the 1940s and 1950s shook up the public and p

the powers-that-be on high alert. Neeson's performance recalls the fixation of his Oskar Schindler, with getting as many people's sex history on paper the goal this time, while Laura Linney, Peter Sarsgaard, John Lithgow and Oliver Platt fill out the deep cast. The intensity of this rise-and-fall story starts to peter out, though, when it gets to the third act, thanks to vagueness in chronology and the sense that many events are being rushed through and oversimplified, right down to the rather mystifyingly upbeat ending. (At Copley, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Overnight ★★★
Is this the greatest Hollywood cautionary tale of all-time or hogwash with a hidden agenda? Probably a little of both, but it's enough of the former to make your jaw drop. You might remember Troy Duffy, the New Hampshire native who seemed to have struck it big in 1997 when Miramax snapped up his first screenplay, signed him to direct it, signed his band to do the soundtrack and even agreed to buy the West Hollywood bar where he tended bar for him. Ultimately, Miramax decided not to make the movie or buy the bar, and the band's record contract fell through. When Duffy finally did make Boondock Saints, it played in a grand total of five theaters, and when the band finally released an album, it was even more of a flop. This documentary shows that a lot of the reason people didn't want to work with Duffy, when all was said and done, was Duffy himself, who generally acted as if he could do everyone's job better than they could, and let them know it. Two of the people he let know were Tony Montana and Mark Brian Smith, who were co-managing the band as well as making a documentary about Duffy's sudden success. They stopped managing the band but kept making the documentary, and they certainly have reason to make Duffy look bad. But Duffy does plenty of that himself, to the point that his brother, also in the band, splits with him. It's a chilling tale of hubris run amok, yet the ending might not be as dismal as that suggests. The Internet Movie Database shows that a sequel to the Tarantino-esque Boondock Saints, which did well on video, is in production, with the estranged brother listed as Duffy's co-writer. So this story isn't over. (At Kendall Square.)

Ray ★★★
Jamie Foxx's monumental performance dominates this fairly conventional biopic in which a talented hero (R&B/pop pioneer Ray Charles) overcomes adverse circumstances (witnessing his brother's drowning, going blind at age 7) and inner demons (a heroin habit, infidelity) to become a beloved American institution. Sometimes director Taylor Hackford's Hollywood treatment stretches credibility, particularly when the movie contrives to have Charles concoct the classic "What'd I Say?" as an impromptu time filler onstage one night. And the movie might be too forgiving of the pain Charles caused his wife. But Foxx is so immersed in the role, giving Charles a sly charisma, and the musical moments (with Foxx lip-synching to Charles' recordings) are so good that the movie's life-affirming intentions win out. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Reconstruction ★★★
This stylish Danish romantic drama takes place at least partially within the head of one of its characters. Is it the photographer (Nikolaj Lie Kaas) who's unsure of his love for his girlfriend (Maria Bonnevie)? The neglected married woman he meets (Bonnevie, as well) and starts a fling with? Or the woman's novelist husband (Krister Kenriksson)? The story certainly gets balled up in such questions by the time it's over, but its adulterous centrel relationship also gives off such a palpable charge of physical attraction, and it's such an intriguing experience that it never becomes as pretentious as it might have. (At the Brattle, December 10-16.)

Seed of Chucky ★
Six years after the surprisingly amusing Bride of Chucky comes this plot-heavy fifth movie in the Child's Play series. The plot is too dense for the movie to actually be fun, and writer-director Don Mancini indulges in the sort of self-referential tale that usually spells the desperate end of a horror franchise. In this case, much of the action involves the "real" events of Bride being made into a Hollywood movie, with a game Jennifer Tilly playing both a self-effacing version of herself and voicing killer-doll Chucky's equally homicidal wife. There are plenty of B-movie in-jokes, with John Waters playing a tabloid photographer and much reference made to Ed Wood's gender-bending, grade-Z Glen or Glenda. But the thick plot and unimaginative horror suffocate the comedy. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Sideways ★★★
Alexander Payne's Sideways does for the approach of middle age what his About Schmidt did for the onset of old age: uses it as a springboard for bittersweet comedy and a road trip. At first, this makes the latest from the director of Citizen Ruth and Election a letdown. But Payne and writing partner Jim Taylor's riffs on male bonding make this story of two 40-ish buddies' trip to California wine country painfully funny. It's hard to say where the characters leave off and the actors begin in the hilarious little moments in which the pair goes to wineries to sample the latest vintages. Paul Giamatti (American Splendor), who could be amusing reading a shopping list, gives a colorful tilt to wine connoisseur Miles' picky assessments of his tastings; in Giamatti's hands, sometimes Miles is being intentionally funny, sometimes not. Meanwhile, Thomas Haden Church's Jack has an endearing dumb-jock quality, and his response to Miles' "knowledgeable" wine talk is usually "tastes pretty good to me." Each man's approach to wine mirrors his approach to life and to the women they meet, of course, with Jack blindly leaping in and Miles analyzing and analyzing. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

Matisyahu finds his direction as a Hasidic reggae rapper.

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

With his long beard and black hat telegraphing his identity as a Hasidic Jew, Matisyahu can turn heads simply by taking the stage at a rock club. But the full impact comes when he opens his mouth to let flow with his soulful mix of reggae toasting, prayer-like vocals and hip-hop human-beatbox mimickry.

"I remember doing some open mikes before I was religious, which kinda flipped people out, a white person doing hip-hop and reggae in that style," says the 25-year-old New Yorker, born Matthew Miller. "Jaws were still hitting the ground when I started singing, and now it's even more."

Matisyahu kicks the flava Hasidic-style on his new CD, Shake Off the Dust... Arise.

Sure, the Orthodox garb is an unusual twist. But anyone who thinks of Matisyahu as mere novelty hasn't tuned into the quality and sincerity of his music, whether on his debut CD Shake Off the Dust... Arise or in a venue like Harpers Ferry, where Matisyahu and his trio play December 9.

"The music speaks for itself, and I think it's a sneak-attack effect, that it gets to people stronger," says Matisyahu, whose songs carry a universal appeal despite themes of Jewish spiritualism inspired by two years of living and studying in a Brooklyn yeshiva.

"I'm a Hasidic Jew and I play music, but I'm not a traveling synagogue," Matisyahu says from the Manhattan office of his label, JDub Records, which promotes Jewish artists in popular culture. "I'm a performer and I want people to hear my music and have a good experience. The majority of the people at a reggae show are not Rastafarian."

In keeping with the strict guidelines of the Lubavitch community in Crown Heights, Matisyahu won't perform from Friday night to Saturday sundown, to observe the Sabbath, and his backstage needs include kosher food. When he sings "I'm getting you high" in "Close Your Eyes," it's "not high from any external substance," he explains, and Matisyahu avoids sharing the stage with performers he deems "gross."

"I have a friend who raps and I've had him come onstage, and there were a couple of times he started talking about being with a girl or started using curse words," Matisyahu says, "and I had to tell him 'You can't do that with me. The whole point of what I'm doing is to go against that.'"

It wasn't always that way. The story of how Matthew Miller became Matisyahu (the Hebrew equivalent of "gift from God") is as intriguing as the cultural and musical culmination.

A teenage Deadhead with dreadlocks who loved reggae and hip-hop, Miller was a searcher. Threatened with expulsion, he bounced from one school to another, traveled to Israel ("the first time I felt positive about being Jewish," he says) and followed Phish on its 1996 fall tour. It was all part of a quest to find a deeper meaning to life than his classrooms and his nonreligious Jewish family, which sent him to a wilderness school in Oregon after the Phish jaunt, offered.

"When I was at a Phish concert, here were kids my age that were probably in a similar predicament, frustrated with the system and the situation that they were living in," says Matisyahu. "They just dropped everything and were going for the truth that they felt when they heard this music. They felt something that resonated, and weren't afraid to say, 'Screw the world, I'm going for that.' At a certain point, it got bad enough, and I said 'That's what I'm doing too.'

"In a certain respect, the same thing happened when I became religious," he says. "I saw people that became religious and were willing to give up everything."

Matisyahu gave up music when he first immersed himself in Torah studies with the Lubavitch community. Having returned to New York for college, he was attracted to the Jewish prayer songs of Shlomo Carlebach at an Upper West Side shul, in addition to the instrumental reggae tapes he blasted at his apartment to rap original lyrics over.

"I had been into reggae from when I was 14 years old, the first time I heard Bob Marley, who was a major figure to me, like a role model," he says. "When I went to college, I got into more modern reggae, like dancehall stuff."

Eventually he came to balance his studies with music again. "Everyone [in the community] felt it was a positive thing for the most part," Matisyahu says. "It's 'kiddush hashem,' which means if somebody sees you doing something and they feel good about it, and they see that you're religious, they connect that feeling with God."

The album title Shake Off the Dust... Arise even comes from Friday night prayers. "It's like shaking off the dust of the week," he says, "shaking off the profane and connecting to the sacred." iB

WHAT MAKES A GREAT BARTENDER?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-card routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartender issue.

MJDOT from Clery's

The new U2 makes me think of you. I deeply apologize for being dumb and immature when we were together. You're the best guy I've ever known, the epitome of life, love, and loyalty. Magner's at MJ's, double-burgers from Castle Island, with your fun furry friend in your Blue Room at China Friend. Remember, there's no 3rd floor at the MFA. I'm sorry.

The Man of My Dreams

I saw you November 11 on the T. You got off the T at the Pru. You had a friend with you and I had my friend with me. We were sitting talking to an older couple and I noticed you when you got on the T. You had a cute tweed hat on, a striped shirt, and khaki-colored jeans. You fit my bill of tall, dark and handsome. I poked my friend and couldn't stop looking at you. We giggled when you dropped your water bottle because you bent over and I got a nice look at your "assets." When you got off the T, I thought you'd walked out of my life forever. I wanted to jump off and get your phone number, but it was too late. Then, to my absolute surprise, you came back and knocked on the window. I was elated, but I still couldn't jump off the T. I waved at you, and would love to see you again. This time, I want at least your name.

Purse Lady

This is for the woman at the Cantab downstairs on the evening of Nov. 13 who hit me in the face with her purse. I know that you didn't intentionally swing your purse into my face, as I was sitting down and you stood over me. We had been sitting at our table for awhile, and you came along sort of oblivious and knocked the thing into my cheek rather hard. The only reason that I tapped your elbow and mentioned it to you, is because I feared it would happen again, as you seemed a bit drunk and the place was crowded. I suppose the "normal" reaction from anybody else would have been, "Oh I'm sorry, I didn't realize." Maybe you would have stepped away slightly, and pulled the purse up your arm so that it was closer to you and not swinging around. Instead, you were defensive and rude, saying, "It's not like I did it on purpose, and decided 'Oh there's that girl so I'll hit her in the face with my purse.'" You then had the audacity to call me a weirdo. So this is my little "weird" note to you about basic manners: A simple apology and perhaps an awareness of your personal space would have sufficed. There was no need to insult me, on top of flinging your purse into my head. Maybe you haven't been going to bars for very long, and are new to appropriate behavior in public places. I forgive you for that, and I hope that you'll forgive my equally childish retort to your weirdo comment. You're not a freak, just clueless.

rockie horoscope

DECEMBER 1 – 14, 2004

BY ROCKIE GARDINER

SAGITTARIUS NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Like Libra, you too may be elevated to sainthood or its pop culture equivalent while your expansive Jupiter ruler and idealistic Neptune form a rewarding trine. While their alliance is spiritually uplifting and beneficial, watch out for "too much of a good thing." You know how quickly the worm can turn, especially while Mercury is going back and forth in your sign. Mercury's retrograde period ends the day before winter officially begins, so don't make any carved-in-stone birthday plans. Be willing to adjust and adapt to changing circumstances.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

Goats are liable to be hailed as heroes while benevolent Jupiter in your reputation-making midheaven exchanges blessings with idealistic Neptune. Even though smoke and mirrors are nowhere in sight, some sort of magical act could be involved. Hopefully, it won't turn out to be a classic bait-and-switch routine. Just remember that there's lots of money to be made, and spread, if you expand your current objective. Use your imagination; envision a higher benefit—spiritual capital?—for all concerned.

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

It seems that you've passed a test of your significant relationship—one set in motion two years ago—with flying colors. Now sit back and count how much your shared resources have grown in the interim. And hasn't the image you project improved as well? The rewarding trine between prosperous, protective Jupiter and enigmatic Neptune in your sign reaches perfection (becomes exact) this week. Enjoy the goodies that land at your feet; perfection doesn't last long, but it will return for summer.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

Old-school as well as new-school Fish should benefit royally from the favors bestowed when Jupiter, your former ruling planet, trines Neptune, the modern ruler of Pisces. This mutually supportive alignment is relatively rare, with four-year intervals between payoffs. However, you might be more intrigued by the sexual excitement being generated while both girly Venus and macho Mars come on to Neptune in a not-so-rare square. Provocative to say the least, and, if the truth be told—which it probably won't be, at least not to you—rare enough.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Divine intervention or merely divine inspiration? While protective Jupiter supports spiritual Neptune at the high point of your chart, consider the benefits bestowed on you—probably via a prosperous partner—an act of God. What other entity, besides a higher power or an all-forgiving mate, would deign to deal with your doubting Thomas or, conversely, superfan routine? Horny Rams are also headed for one of those relatively rare, once-every-two year interludes when your rambunctious Mars ruler weds romantic Venus, this time in sexy Scorpio.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

Yesterday, Mercury turned retrograde in your house of sex and death, inheritances and insurance; ways you can be deeply affected by other people's values. Don't assume you can take information for granted until mid January, especially delivery and departure dates. Despite the helter-skelter atmosphere of the holiday season party plans, you're due to experience perhaps the most romantic encounter of the past two years. And because ballsy Mars and your Venus ruler meet in your Scorpio marriage house, who knows down what aisle that'll lead?

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

Your Mercury ruler's flip into retrograde on the 30th can affect significant relationships for far longer than the usual three weeks. Not until January 8 will the Messenger (and by association, you) be free and clear of whatever began with the new moon on November 13. So resign yourself to going back and forth, revising your position and realigning with allies/adversaries, until then. Bored already at the prospect? Don't be—there's enough variation on the theme to maintain interest, especially when less-significant others become involved.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Your philanthropic sentiments could know no bounds while prosperous Jupiter and idealistic Neptune form a supportive trine. Will it be a deserving charity or an artistic partner who benefits from your good intentions? Or will you direct that optimism inward and spend all that money on making your home a better place to live? This could be the most spiritually rewarding holiday season since 2000, the last time these visionaries were in such harmony, so before you become totally engrossed in a hot-and-heavy romance, choose a beneficiary.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Prepare to wing it. Mercury turning retrograde in your house of romance, recreation and risk suggests that plans you've made for all of December and the first week of January might have to be revised at a moment's notice. If you're entertaining, keep it casual. Air/hotel reservations? Keep your fingers crossed. A romantic tryst? Keep it a secret from chatty Mercury, while it darts this way and that through Sagittarius. Despite possible detours and delays, the holidays can still meet your high expectations.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

Your Mercury ruler's retrograde trip through Sagittarius will likely center on family relationships, but other than a shift of focus from a partnership arrangement, the Gemini forecast applies to you too. Check the timing so you know when to ease up on what might easily become overly voracious demands. Pluto in Sag amps up the intensity of everyone's unspoken desires while its meeting with Mercury puts additional pressure on your ability to discern what's best for all concerned. This includes priorities as well as presents.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Feel free to vaunt your moral superiority and breadth of vision while expansive Jupiter in Libra finds favor with idealistic, imaginative Neptune. This hook-up is so rare that canonization for sainthood might not be far behind. Benevolent Jupiter will bestow lots of rewards while it's in your sign, but come next Thanksgiving it'll be gone. Do your good deeds ASAP, so that when your all-embracing Venus ruler joins passionate Mars in Scorpio on the 5th, nothing will distract you from wholeheartedly pursuing romance.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Knowing that Mercury is retrograde in your Sagittarius house of money and values until December 19 could change your Xmas plans. Would it be safer to wait until then and order all your gifts online and shipped FedEx overnight? Too expensive? How about giving everyone on your list a check postdated for January 8, which is when Mercury finally emerges from the shadow it fell under the weekend of November 12? That's also when the Scorpio new moon launched another phase of your ever-evolving personal development.

IF IT'S TUESDAY, THIS MUST BE A CHARITY FUND-RAISER...

Even before the holiday season started in earnest, the social season was fully underway, as a blizzard of invitations kept arriving for more soirees than you could shake a shillelagh at.

On a Sunday night, the biggest of bigshots showed up in Chestnut Hill for the 20th annual Joey O'Donnell Film Premiere to raise money to fight cystic fibrosis. Hosted by concessions mogul Joe O'Donnell and his lovely wife, Kathy (for whose son the evening is named), it attracted such potent notables as the almost lifelike Mitt Romney; news anchor Joe Shortsleeve and his gorgeous blonde wife, Susie, stockbroker-to-the-stars John Spooner and the delectable Susan, and hordes of others, who enjoyed a cocktail reception at the Atrium Mall before heading over to the Chestnut Hill Cinema for a sneak peek at the new Johnny Depp movie, Neverland. Needless to say, the popcorn and candy were on the house, and the only thing that could have improved the evening was if Johnny Depp himself had appeared, but then again, the whole point was to do good, not to start a riot.

The following night, a long overdue meeting took place when the Boston Center for Adult Education hosted a VIP reception at Fenway Park's 406 Club for documentary filmmaker and rabid Red Sox fan Ken Burns. It's difficult to say which commanded more attention: the guest of honor or the World Series trophy, which was front and center the entire time, giving guests like Cambridge real estate tycoon Marvin Gilmore and Red Sox bigwig Dr. Charles Steinberg an opportunity to pose for pictures with it, although one guest remained blasé, saying, "Not to sound negative or anything, but it needs to be polished."

At the 406 Club: Ken Burns and the World Series Trophy

Midweek found Everyone Who's Anyone at the Cyclorama for the preview party for the Boston International Fine Art Show, which this year benefited Project Discovery. Browsing among the dealers' stalls (where we were sorely tempted by a beautiful seascape but soundly rebuffed by the five-digit price tag), we spotted such connoisseurs and cognoscenti as super-smooth restaurateur Darryl Settles; social butterfly Natalie Gardiner; the ever affable Bert Cohen and his delightful wife, Rosalie; Dover art dealer David Hall and his wife, Corinne; the aforementioned Spooners, and so on and so forth.

By the weekend, it was time to break out the formalwear for Steppin' Out, the fund-raiser for the Dimock Community Health Center, which transformed the World Trade Center into a multiplex of re-created legendary jazz clubs like the Hi-Hat, the Jazz Workshop and the Savoy, with different entertainers performing in each. This year's headliner was Grammy-winning R&B sensation Will Downing, and, as always, the evening attracted a high-powered, predominantly African-American crowd, like über mover-and-shaker Earl Tate; power couple Frances and Bud Moseley; the soignee Millie Clements and her spectacular daughter, Michelle; the aforementioned Marvin Gilmore; Boston Globe gadfly BMaynard Scarborough; and welcome new additions to Boston Milton Little (the new head of the United Way of Massachusetts Bay), and his wife, Traci.

Meanwhile, across town at the Orpheum, Bruins legend Cam Neely was hosting the umpteenth annual Comics Come Home, an evening of stand-up comedy to raise money for cancer patients and their families. Following the performance, a VIP party was held at Vinalia, where star-struck guests rubbed elbows with the likes of funnymen Denis Leary, Lenny Clarke, Steve Sweeney and Dane Cook, although the highest-wattage celebrity had to have been corn-rowed baseball deity Bronson Arroyo, who helped not only to lift the curse of the Bambino but forced Denis Leary to retire that joke about "Bucky f---ing Dent."

It seems that Monday is the new Thursday, as the beginning of the work week brought all of deep-pocketed Back Bay and Beacon Hill to Kings for the 2nd annual Bowl-A-Rama to benefit Kids Can Cook. Spotted enjoying the sport of...well, if not of kings, then at least of guys named Earl, were such socialites and swanky folks as philanthropists Susan and Bill Poduska; globe-trotting adventurer Linda Schwabe; mondo-party planner Bryan Rafanelli and his other half, Mark Walsh; the super-glamorous Rachael Goldfarb; design avatar Denise Korn; stunning blonde Simone Winston; and interior designer Fotene DeMoulas, who deserved big prizes for the shirts she had made for her team with fake names (Among them: Regina Upright, Terry Cloth, Rick Liner, and Bob Barcalounger.) However, the evening's biggest props go to fashion plate Barbara Lemperly-Grant of Chanel, who gamely donned appropriate footwear, prompting an acquaintance to say, "I never thought I'd see you wearing rented shoes."

With so many parties and worthwhile fund-raisers, it's a wonder anyone had time to do anything else, and now might be a good time to look into vitamin B shots, since the festive season is upon us, and the pace is only going to get more frenetic. In the meantime, you'll find yours truly wading through a pile of invitations, soaking my feet and repeating, "Tonight, I promise not to eat or drink more than I ought to." iB

The World's Best Rum Has Reached Boston!

Ron Zacapa Centenario – A Rum Without Peer

Ron Zacapa Centenario, from the small Guatemalan town of Zacapaneca, is often regarded as the world's finest rum. Part of the secret lies in the cool-climate aging; by storing the rum in bodegas 8,000 feet above sea level, the spirit is able to age slowly and gracefully for 23 years, much longer than other fine sipping rums. Pick up a bottle of Centenario, grasp the unique palm leaf wrapper woven by local artisans, and you immediately sense this is a rum without peer.

- The Only Rum To Receive 4 Consecutive Gold Medals at The Rum Fesitval of Barbados 1998,1999,2000,2001
- A 98 Point Rating from the Wine Enthusiast, the highest score ever for a rum.

Zacapa Mojito

2 oz. Ron Zacapa Centenario
Juice of two limes
2 tbs. superfine granulated sugar
Splash club soda
5-10 mint leaves

Combine ingredients in a cocktail shaker with ice. Shake and strain into an ice-filled glass. Top with a splash of club soda and garnish with a sprig of mint.

Honey Martini

Created by Christopher (Stretch) Gerdon, China Grill, Miami
2 1/2 oz. Zacapa Centenario
1 oz. of diluted Honey
Squeeze 1/2 Lemon
Splash of Soda Water

Shake juice and ingredients together with ice, and strain into martini glass. Add splash of soda and garnish with lime wheel.

Tamarind Rum Punch

(Created by Chuck Simeone, Spice Market, NYC)
1 1/2 oz. Ron Zacapa Centenario
2 1/2 oz. tamarind nectar

DOUBLE CROSS

With Marlborough native Marcia Cross on our cover this issue, we say goodbye to 2004 and ring in the New Year with a bang. ABC describes Cross' character on its "darkly comedic" new show Desperate Housewives as "Martha Stewart on steroids," and in her interview with Jonathan Soroff, Cross says she loves playing the neurotic suburbanite. And audiences obviously love watching: The show is tops in the ratings, even beating out reality heavies like The Apprentice.

You'll see Cross' face in our newsboxes for twice as long as usual—this extra-chunky issue covers four weeks instead of two. You'll also notice one format change. We've temporarily moved Ezra Dyer's widely read humor column to the back page to fill the spot normally occupied by Jonathan Soroff's popular Last Scene Here. We're happy to report that Soroff is recovering rapidly from his recent heart surgery, and, like his many fans, we look forward to his social column's return very soon.

HEADING SOUTHIE

I just read Ezra's column about moving to South Boston (Dec. 1). I'm part of the yuppification of Southie—I bought one of those condo rehabs last year—and I think he's going to love it here. It's amazing how close Southie is to the rest of Boston, and yet how few Bostonians come here. Plus, granted it's not Malibu, but we have beachfront. Here are a few tips for Ezra and other new Southie transplants:

The Beer Garden and Playwright on Broadway are good eats and drinks. The 6 House is decent as well. Of course, lots of the older Southie haunts (Amrhein's, Shenanigan's, the L Street Tavern) are solid too. I've avoided the hole-in-the-wall places that I'm sure aren't as welcoming to nonlifers. (There's a place down the street from me simply called Pub, which makes me laugh, but not laugh enough to join those inside.)

Parking isn't as daunting as you might imagine—especially in comparison to the South End, Back Bay and Beacon Hill. Don't be shocked if your bumper gets a few dings and dents in it, though. In fact, if you take someone's shoveled and marked parking spot during a huge snowstorm, don't be surprised to see more than a few dents or dings.

You might want to get a decent paper shredder as well. I'm convinced some of my longer-term Southie neighbors are a little nosey.

And if you're a Yankees fan like me, you won't want to publicize that in Southie.

WHERE HAVE YOU BEN?

It was with great dismay that I discovered you had discontinued your Ben Mezrich letters feature. Over the past few weeks, I had come to depend on the IMPROPER as my source for letters by and about the "Sexiest Author Alive" (according to a recent People magazine). Unfortunately, I'll now have to turn to the Metro for my Ben Mezrich fix. If I had a subscription, I'd ask to you to cancel it. But I don't, so I won't.

A BREATH OF FRESH AIR

Psychotherapists, Lamaze coaches, yogis and pilates instructors agree: Breath is the key to relaxation and the mind/body connection. Believers in the power of breath will appreciate the focus at Exhale, a brand new, 13,000-square-foot spa that opened in the Back Bay in mid December. Exhale, which has three locations in New York, takes a holistic approach to spa service, focusing as much on replenishing clients' spiritual and physical well-being as on their physical appearance.

With 15 treatment rooms devoted to the art of making you look and feel good, there's no shortage of luxurious beauty options. An array of massages, facials, waxing, peels, and mani- and pedi- options are available, as are holistic therapies like shiatsu, reflexology, reiki and craniosacral therapy. You can even purify your body with acu-organ detox (a $150-an-hour treatment meant to bring higher levels of energy and mental clarity by combining acupuncture and hot-oil abdominal therapy). Similarly healing-oriented, Exhale's fusion massage uses herbal and aromatherapy oils for detox purposes ($110 for an hour; $80 half an hour). Body enlightening is another choice that's been popular at Exhale's New York locations. It's a mind-body therapy that incorporates yoga, assisted stretching, relaxation and body alignment ($150 an hour).

Exhale also offers exercise classes in two giant workout studios. Several yoga classes are available daily, in addition to Exhale's signature class in core fusion, an exercise that combines pilates with orthopedic stretching and yoga. The physical well-being doesn't come cheap: Core fusion classes are $30 for an hour-long session; $20 for a half hour.

If you're going to a spa appointment before or after your fitness class, you can take a "breather" in the official quiet room. On your way out, you can stop by the spa's organic café counter, which sells fruit juices and smoothies, and a retail shop where you can buy Exhale brand workout gear and beauty products. 28 Arlington St., Boston (617-532-7000). www.exhalespa.com. —E.H.

REPLAY

Keith Foulke's World Series–ending toss to Doug Mientkiewicz was pretty memorable, but fast-forward two months, and the whirlwind 176-game season that preceded it might be a little foggy. Luckily, there are enough World Series/Red Sox tributes out there to keep baseball fans busy until the pitchers-and-catchers reports surface. From Major League Baseball comes The Official 2004 World Series ($19.95), a DVD narrated by Denis Leary that focuses on the Sox' three playoff series. Rabid fans might prefer NESN's Faith Rewarded: The Historic Season of the 2004 Boston Red Sox ($19.99). True to the network's devotion to the local nine, Faith provides in-depth regular-season coverage as well as gratuitous Yankee bashing. How does the World Series rank in comparison with other historic moments in Boston sports? The Globe's three-hour DVD, Boston's Greatest Sports Stories: Beyond the Headlines ($19.99), highlights Sox hits, along with some Celtics, Pats and Bruins moments. MLB released one official World Series magazine, Keep the Faith ($10), which sums up the season in 100 pages containing 200-plus action photos. —Rich Levine inner view

SUE GRAFTON

Popular and prolific mystery author Sue Grafton is the woman behind the "alphabet series" of novels, the latest of which is R Is for Ricochet (Putnam). An exhibition of manuscript pages, photos and memorabilia, titled Sue Grafton: Woman of Mystery, is on display on the main floor of Boston University's Mugar Library through January 7. We spoke with Grafton by phone at her home in Kentucky.

Improper Bostonian: So, what is "S" for?
Sue Grafton: Usually what I do is keep the title under my hat because book stores will have contests to see if readers can guess what the next title's going to be. Also, I don't know the title for sure from the start. Usually I'll have a couple of possibilities and hold out to see what the book tells me.
IB: What happens when you're done with Z Is for Zonian [a U.S. citizen who lives in the Panama Canal Zone]?
SG: I don't know. It'll take me 15 years to get to that point, and who knows what they'll be doing 15 years from now? I've got a long way to go with eight more books, but I'll get there. I'd be drawn and quartered if I didn't.
IB: How much time do you spend writing on a given day?
SG: Between three and five hours. But not all of that is writing. It's cogitating, researching, getting stuck. There are people who can write more than eight hours a day, but I'm not one of them. I don't know what kind of drugs they're on, but I want some.
IB: Do you ever paint yourself into a corner with a story?
SG: Yes. I've started books, got five chapters in and realized it wasn't gonna fly. That's the hardest thing, when you realize you have to dump a book. That happened with H Is for Homicide. But in the end, it's cleansing. It's cathartic.
IB: How much research goes into one of your books?
SG: I do a lot, because one of the horrors is that I'll make a fool of myself by not doing my research. I need to know if a scheme is going to work long before I get to it in the book. But on the other hand, you've got to resist the temptation to keep researching forever and not get to the story.
IB: Is a murder the single most compelling plot element you can use to begin a story?
SG: I think it is. There are a great many compelling story elements, but murder is still a great taboo, and such a devastating event in people's lives. And the public is more interested in it these days, especially the forensic side. One of the differences in fictional crime, though, is that there's always a strong motive. In real life, that's not always true. People get killed for a pair of tennis shoes. They get hit by a stray bullet. In fiction, there's a scheme, and somehow that's comforting. It's not just mayhem.
IB: Do real-life crimes inform your books?
SG: Q Is for Quarry was taken from a murder that happened in 1965 in Santa Barbara. It was the only time I've done that. A girl was murdered and left by the side of the road. I paid to have the body exhumed and the face reconstructed. There's a picture of her in the back of the book, and I was hoping someone would see it and know who she was. She hasn't been identified, but I'm in an odd way optimistic.
IB: So you're actively involved in trying to solve a crime yourself.
SG: No. I'm just trying to get her identified, which, I suppose, is the first step.
IB: Would Kinsey Millhone have found the real killer in the O.J. case?
SG: Sure. She's busy working on one right now. In real life, some crimes are never solved, and that's the joy of fiction—there's always resolution.
IB: What's a mystery to you?
SG: How we get by from day to day. Just putting one foot in front of the other. How these books get written. —Ezra Dyer tasty tidbits

A TASTE OF THE GOOD LIFE

Trans Fatty Farewell... Let's face it, we've got as good a chance of making it through the holiday season without indulging our sweet tooth as we do of heading to Fenway and not hearing that the Yankees suck. But this winter, Au Bon Pain can help lift some of the guilt with its new Zero Grams Trans Fat Cookies. The new, healthier option for satisfying your cookie cravings is available in 14 different flavors, like Chocolate Chip, Oatmeal Raisin and English Toffee. They may not be low in calories, but you and your arteries should be on great terms heading into 2005.

Big-Time Bubbly... Not a hip-hop video goes by where we don't find ourselves wondering what it must be like to sit back and casually sip on some Dom Perignon or Cristal, that is until we remember that one bottle can cost upwards of $200. Through the month of December, however, Aujourd'hui at the Four Seasons is offering diners a taste of the good life, with a temporary menu of 16 of the world's most high-class champagnes (think Dom, Cristal and Grande Cuvée) by the glass. You can try these high-class champagnes, which are usually only available in the bottle, for between $18 and $50 a glass.

Dunkin' Debit... In the ongoing battle between Dunkin' Donuts and Starbucks, the latest salvo from the DD camp is actually long-delayed return fire: Three years after Starbucks introduced the Starbucks Card, Dunkin' now offers its own plastic for cashless coffee. Customers can put between $5 and $100 on the card, enough to buy a wicked lotta crullahs. The question now is how long we'll have to wait for Starbucks to retaliate against Dunkin's killer innovation, the reclosable sippy lid.

Two-Faced Fare... When the space that used to be home to the Good Life Cambridge became available, restaurateur Joe Arcari couldn't resist the chance to extend his dining empire. He liked it so much, in fact, he opened two new restaurants. "The space was so big it just seemed to work better as two places," Arcari says. "That way both areas could be a little more intimate." The Tavern is a casual, neighborhood-style pub, with two bars and a standard American fare menu. The other half, Wish, is a more upscale, 40-seat Italian-American bistro. The new spots, which opened November 22, are open nightly for dinner (the Tavern also serves lunch), and Arcari plans to feature DJs and live music throughout the week from acts like the Catunes (whose lead singer, Mark Morris, is a partner in the venture). 720 Mass Ave., Cambridge (617-868-8800).

VIVA VIDAL

Let's face it, haircuts don't come cheap anymore, especially when the name Vidal Sassoon hangs above the door. But the designer hair guru has taken pity on shallow pockets and introduced a new concept with a sister salon, Sassoon Studio, which recently opened in Newton Centre (only the second U.S. location). The idea is to get Vidal quality (complete with Sassoon's Newbury Street salon–trained stylists) in a more casual environment. Vidal Sassoon International creative director Tim Hartley explains, "We want to offer consumers options in their hair-care experience." Translation: fashion-forward hair styles at affordable prices. Cuts and color both start at $50. 796 Beacon St., Newton Centre (617-243-9400). —Samantha House

NEW YEAR'S EVE HOTEL PACKAGES

A memorable meal and a bottle of bubbly are a great start to a corker of a New Year's Eve, but if you really want to take it up a notch, why not add overnight accommodations into the mix? Many local hotels offer special packages that'll have you and your sweetie greeting 2005 in luxury.

Boston Harbor Hotel

70 Rowes Wharf, Boston. (617-439-7000). www.bhh.com.

One package includes luxury accommodations for two, a bottle of champagne and full American breakfast at the Intrigue Café for $425. Another, at $545, gets you two passes to the First Night festivities, accommodations for two, a five-course dinner with a glass of champagne at Meritage, and New Year's Day brunch for two in the Atlantic Room.

Boston Park Plaza Hotel

64 Arlington St., Boston (617-426-2000). www.bostonparkplaza.com.

Boasting an ultra convenient First Night location for New Year's accommodations, and two First Night buttons, the Park Plaza's package runs from $209–$229.

Charles Hotel

1 Bennett St., Cambridge (617-864-1200). www.charleshotel.com.

Enjoy an overnight in a deluxe room, dinner for two, a bottle of sparkling wine, and breakfast in bed or at Henrietta's Table, starting at $425. Or opt for the Jazz Package: an overnight stay, dinner at Henrietta's Table, a midnight champagne toast and dancing to live music, starting at $499.

Charles Street Inn

94 Charles St., Boston (617-314-8900). www.charlesstreetinn.com.

The Charles' two-night package might suit out-of-town visitors. After celebrating First Night (compliments of the Charles), retire to your room for a bottle of champagne and Frette slippers. $850 for Friday and Saturday; $750 for Thursday and Friday nights.

Kendall Hotel

350 Main St., Cambridge (617-577-1300). www.kendallhotel.com.

The Kendall's NYE package includes a chilled bottle of champagne, dinner for two at the Black Sheep Restaurant, two First Night buttons, and a late checkout to boot, for $199.

Langham Hotel Boston

250 Franklin St., Boston (617-451-1900). www.langhamhotels.com.

Guests can indulge at the Langham's Chocolate Bar Buffet while listening to Brazilian music by the Evan Gutierrez Quintet, and cure their champagne hangover with a Sunday Recover brunch for two and a late checkout. Starts at $345.

The Lenox Hotel

61 Exeter St., Boston (617-536-5300). www.lenoxhotel.com.

In addition to prime real estate in the center of the city's festivities, the Lenox's package includes two free First Night buttons, champagne, chocolates and deluxe accommodations for two for $399.

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

The Hub's Newest Pub...As the country's most Irish city, we know a thing or two about pubs, but even Boston hasn't necessarily seen a watering hole of this magnitude. In early January, McFadden's Restaurant and Saloon takes over the huge 7,500-square-foot former State Street home of the Exchange. The Financial District spot will serve lunch and dinner—both American and traditional Irish fare—and boasts six 42-inch flat screens as well as smaller, individual flat screens in each of six booths. There are also two DJs (one on each floor) every night, three bars and a VIP room with available bottle service. 148 State St., Boston (617-227-5100).

Manic Monday... Monday's not known as an especially hot night around the Hub, but the Back Bay's 33 Restaurant and Lounge might change that. On December 6, 33 debuted the Lundi Lounge, a new Monday night venture in its downstairs bar that features weekly theme parties, as well as a quick cure for an extreme case of the Mondays. Upcoming concepts include a World Cup soccer party December 27. 33 Stanhope St., Boston (617-572-3311).

Diamonds and Rubies and Gold, Oh My... As Carol Channing once said, diamonds are a girl's best friend. As are gold, emeralds and pretty much any jewelry that'll set you back several thousand dollars. Such is the stuff of Pageo fine jewelers, which after 28 years in Newton Centre and eight in Nantucket, opened a branch on Newbury Street in November. Owners Pam Swartz and George Pelz deal mainly in contemporary jewels from Italy as well as custom-made items, and pride themselves on carrying unique pieces that can't be found at Neiman's and Saks' counters. Stock ranges from diamond hoops ($500–$700) to custom-made diamond rings that top out around $400,000, with nary a Tiffany Bean or Yurman bangle in sight. 33 Newbury St., Boston (617-266-0066).

Fabulous Fabric Find... If you're looking for upholstery that's beyond the garden-variety cotton twills and leathers of stores like Pottery Barn and Crate and Barrel, then check out Baranzelli Silk Wholesalers, Charles Street's newest designer addition. Interiors enthusiasts will recognize the brand as the more affordable version of über textile house Scalamandre. In addition to its own line of cottons, silks and linens, Baranzelli features discounted Scalamandre close-out fabrics. Reupholstery and window treatment services are to come. 28 Charles St., Boston (617-227-1515). —R.L. and J.I.

THE COLLINS CARD

KRAFT HAS MADE PATS THE MODEL FRANCHISE

Are Patriots fans getting complacent?... A happy Paul Pierce moment, off the court

These days, when I watch the New England Patriots I find myself, like many, just waiting, expecting the Pats to make a play, and for the other team to screw it up. And you know what? They never fail me. Death, taxes and the Patriots steamrolling somebody have become the new inevitables. As a matter of fact, it's so normal, so routine, and Patriots fans are becoming so spoiled, that a lot of the energy that used to permeate Route 1 in Foxboro is now being reserved for the real season, the playoffs.

I've never seen a more subdued crowd in Foxboro than the one at last month's Sunday night game, when the Patriots hosted the Buffalo Bills. All the story lines that used to get us riled up and panting—ex-Pats Drew Bledsoe and Lawyer Milloy back in town; the Bills, a divisional rival hoping to return the favor after the Pats beat them a month earlier—were in place. But the crowd didn't care. It felt more like being at Symphony Hall than at an NFL game.

The Patriots dismantled the Bills that night in such a methodical manner that the game was never in doubt. It was like the Road Runner and Wile E. Coyote. You knew Bledsoe was going down hard.

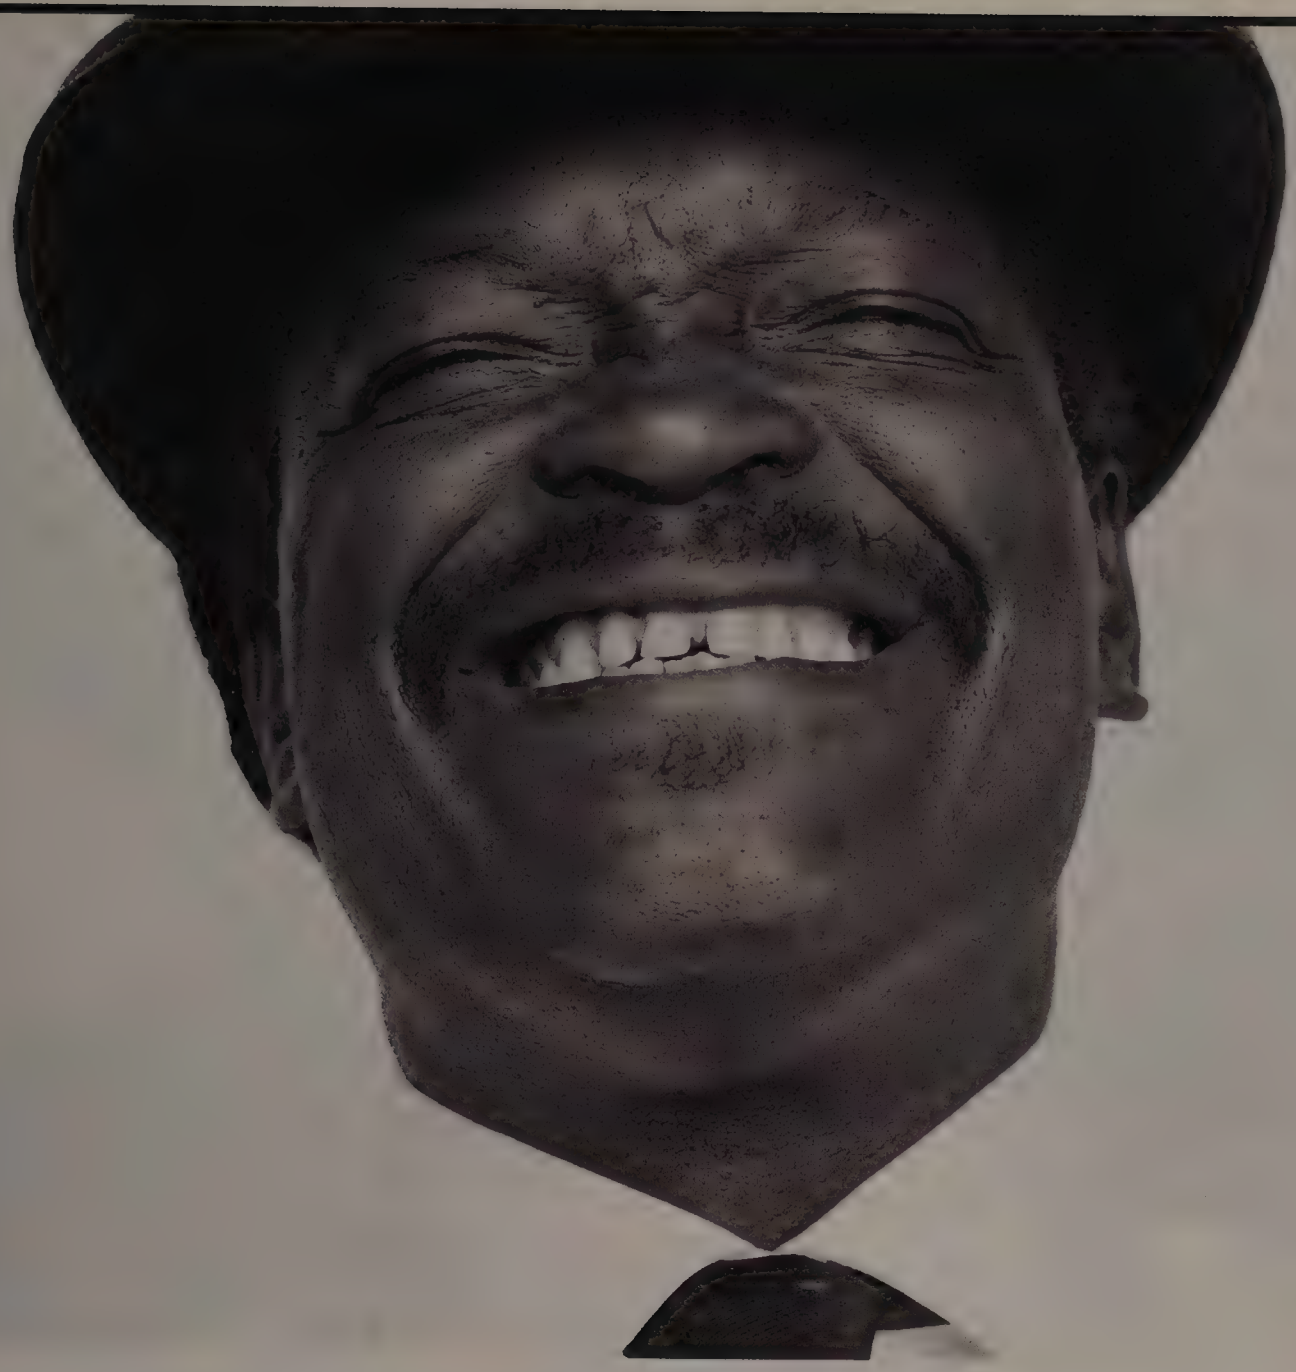
Are we taking this team for granted? Worse, have we become like Atlanta Braves fans, who've had one of the greatest runs in pro sports over the last quarter century, nailing down 13 consecutive divisional titles? The same unimaginative fans who could only muster the Tomahawk Chop as their calling card? Atlanta fans, though, seem to get a little louder come playoff time. Maybe that's what I witnessed against Buffalo: fans who don't want to waste their energy on the games that don't matter.

In the new, salary-cap NFL, teams get to the Super Bowl by selling their soul for just one chance (see Baltimore, New York Giants, Tampa and Oakland). Somehow, not only have the Patriots bucked the odds, but there doesn't seem to be an end in sight. That's not supposed to happen any more.

With all the winning and joy Bob Kraft has brought to the area, my personal favorite moment happened on January 2, 1999, in Jacksonville. It was the night before the Pats' playoff game against the Jaguars. Kraft was watching a football game with his son Jonathan and a couple of friends in the hotel bar where I was staying. I went over and said hello. As I was leaving, Bob Kraft asked where I was going. When I replied that I was going to a club the doorman had recommended, Kraft said, "We're going back to our hotel. Come with us. We'll give you a ride."

My photographer and I jumped in Kraft's limo and were dropped off at the club. It was a little thing, but it told me a lot about the man on top of the Patriots organization. He's a winner, but more importantly, he's a good guy. It's nice when good guys finish first.

While Paul Pierce hasn't been a very happy camper thus far this season, expressing frustration at spending the prime of his career on a team that's mired in mediocrity, it was bittersweet to see him happily joking around with former teammate Antoine Walker at his Runway 34 fashion show, which took place just before the Celtics embarked on the 2004 campaign. A public relations woman tried desperately to get a picture early in the evening by asking Pierce if he could join Walker, who was standing about 10 feet away. Pierce's response: "He knows where I am."



THE PATRIOTS DISMANTLED THE BILLS THAT NIGHT IN SUCH A METHODICAL MANNER THAT THE GAME WAS NEVER IN DOUBT. IT WAS LIKE THE ROAD RUNNER AND WILE E. COYOTE.

So the PR woman tried asking Walker. His response was, "If Paul wants to take a picture he can come over here."

The poor PR woman went back and forth between the two parties while the photographer, who was just looking for a quick shot so he could leave, viewed the scene like he was watching a tennis match.

When the joking stopped, the pair took the photo. It was nice to see—two old friends, who went through a lot of their growing years together, at peace. IB

MARCIA CROSS

INTERVIEW BY JONATHAN SOROFF PHOTOGRAPH BY GREG HENRY/LAMOINE PHOTO GROUP

Long before she got the role of Bree Van De Kamp in ABC's hit series Desperate Housewives, Marlborough native Marcia Cross was determined to become an actress. At the age of 18 she was accepted at the Juilliard School as a drama major. On stage Cross performed in La Ronde at the Williamstown Theater Festival, in Twelfth Night at the Hartford Stage Company, and in Two Gentlemen of Verona at the Old Globe in San Diego. Her first television job was on the daytime drama The Edge of Night. Leaving New York to try her luck in Los Angeles, Cross was soon landing roles in television movies such as The Last Days of Frank and Jessie James, co-starring with Johnny Cash and Kris Kristofferson. Her role as Dr. Kimberly Shaw on Melrose Place began when she was hired for one episode. The producers were so impressed, they kept asking her back for additional appearances, eventually bringing her character back from the dead to continue on the hit show.

Cross also guest-starred on such series as Seinfeld, where she played Jerry's dermatologist girlfriend, and Cheers, where she portrayed the younger sister of Kirstie Alley's character. Cross has also appeared on the comedies Ally McBeal, Spin City, The Garry Shandling Show and The King of Queens. Her dramatic roles include appearances on CSI, Profiler and Touched by an Angel. Cross' film credits include Living in Fear, Always Say Good-bye, Dancing in September and Bad Influence. Aside from her career as an actress, Cross has also recently completed her clinical training to earn a master's degree in psychology. She lives in Los Angeles.

Jonathan Soroff: So are you really a certifiable lunatic or do you just play one on TV?

Marcia Cross: Well, this character isn't insane…

JS: She's pretty tightly wound.

MC: I always say she's neurotic, not psychotic, and they've promised to keep her that way. She will not be going Kimberly on me.

JS: Did you major in over-the-top psychos at Juilliard?

MC: Seems to be my specialty.

JS: Any correlation between the fact that you just got a master's degree in psychology and that you play some unhinged women on TV?

MC: Oh, I think everyone is unhinged to some degree. I just happen to like portraying those people.

JS: Do you ever look at your education and your career and say to yourself, "All that classical training for this?!"

MC: It takes all that training to do this.

JS: So are you mentally prepared to be the next pop-cultural it-girl?

MC: No, I'm not. [Chuckles.] I'm already exhausted.

JS: On Melrose Place, you got killed and came back to life like three times. Do you believe in life after death?

MC: Absolutely.

JS: The famous scene where Kimberly pulled her wig off was worthy of an Emmy, don't you think?

MC: I don't know that I deserve an Emmy.

JS: Did they teach soap opera acting at Juilliard?

MC: Oh, yeah. You have to make it to the fourth year, which I did, and then I had a private class in it, and a tutor…

JS: Really?! I was being facetious!

MC: So am I!

JS: Wow, you really are an incredible actor. Speaking of which, you have one of the best screams in the business…

MC: …I actually am a screamer.

JS: I don't think I'm gonna touch that one…

MC: Oh, no, there hasn't been a lot of that lately.

JS: Safer territory: You played Seinfeld's girlfriend?

MC: Well, we went on a date. That to me doesn't count as being his girlfriend.

JS: How about your hair color. Is it real?

MC: Not anymore.

JS: What's the maintenance on that?

MC: It's a lotta work, and I'd say it's pricey, too.

[BREE VAN DE KAMP] IS NEUROTIC, NOT PSYCHOTIC, AND THEY'VE PROMISED TO KEEP HER THAT WAY… I THINK EVERYONE IS UNHINGED TO SOME DEGREE. I JUST HAPPEN TO LIKE PLAYING THOSE PEOPLE.

JS: Worst line you ever had to deliver?

MC: Oh, my God. There have been too many to count. On One Life To Live, every time we got a bad line, we'd write it on the wall, but the ones I remember were from my first job, on Edge of Night, and they weren't mine. We'd always quote the famously bad ones, like, "Does that cellar door still lead to the basement?" Or "It's a lie, a lie, I tell you—a lie designed to conceal the truth!"

JS: Botox—yea or nay?

MC: I'm pro anything that makes you happier.

JS: So are you a Botox user, and if so, how do you still make all those horrified facial expressions?

MC: Oh, yeah, I use it. But I have more muscles in my face than a normal person needs to make any kind of expression.

JS: Are you sick of people quoting The Brady Bunch: "Marcia, Marcia, Marcia."

MC: Oh, no. Doesn't bother me a bit.

JS: Let's discuss Marsha vs. Marcia.

MC: Personally, I just like the way it ["c-i-a"] looks visually, with a capital M and then all small letters. I was named after my father.

JS: Your father's name is Marcia?!

MC: No. It's Mark. But they could've called me Martha, so I'm grateful.

JS: OK. Fill in the blank: Redheads do it _____.

MC: Redheads do it brilliantly.

JS: Oooooooh. I've heard your character on Desperate Housewives compared to Martha Stewart…

MC: Yeah, but I don't get that. I understand in the sense that in our culture, she's the one responsible for doing everything domestic so beautifully, but I don't really relate to her in a psychological or emotional way. I think I play the character more energetically.

JS: What's up with her name: Bree Van De Kamp, like the fish sticks?

MC: Or the pork and beans, or something. Umm, I don't know, but I love it.

JS: What's not to love, since Bree's gonna buy you a big new house or a shiny new car?

MC: [Laughs.] I have a new fabulous mattress. I think that's where everyone should start when spoiling themselves. It's just absolutely deliciously comfortable.

JS: So who does Bree remind you of?

MC: Oh, there are several people I have in mind. She's a composite of several people who shall remain nameless. There's little bits of all sorts of people I know.

JS: What does your closet at home look like?

MC: [Laughing.] It could use a little Bree touch.

JS: How about your purse? What's in it?

MC: It's pretty boring. Aside from the ordinary, like wallet and keys, there's as many lip glosses as I can fit, or none, cause I can never find them. So it's either 15 or zero.

JS: Not a handgun?

MC: Afraid not.

JS: Does Heather Locklear have the Midas touch when it comes to TV?

MC: Well, she's fantastic, but I know that I personally don't want to be at an airport every week, and I don't know if even she can glamorize an airport. But she is gold that girl. For sure.

JS: So which members of the Melrose Place cast did you sleep with?

MC: In real life? Not a one.

JS: What a missed opportunity! It was such a sexy cast.

MC: I know, but unfortunately, there was nothing there.

JS: Last question: As a psychologist, what's your advice to desperate housewives?

MC: Get thee to a spa! IB

WHAT'S IN AND OUT FOR

As the undisputed arbiters of all that is cool, we at the IMPROPER once again present, for your benefit, our annual In and Out list. If it's In for next year, it's here. If it's Out, it's smurf to us, as it should be to you, unless you yourself are as Out as a cheese plate on Air Tran. But we're firm believers that with a little guidance, everyone can live the In life. Except maybe R. Kelly. So dig In!

The 411 on 2004

IT WAS THE BEST OF TIMES, IT WAS THE WORST OF TIMES, BUT 2004 CONFIRMED BOSTON'S POSITION AS THE HUB OF THE UNIVERSE.

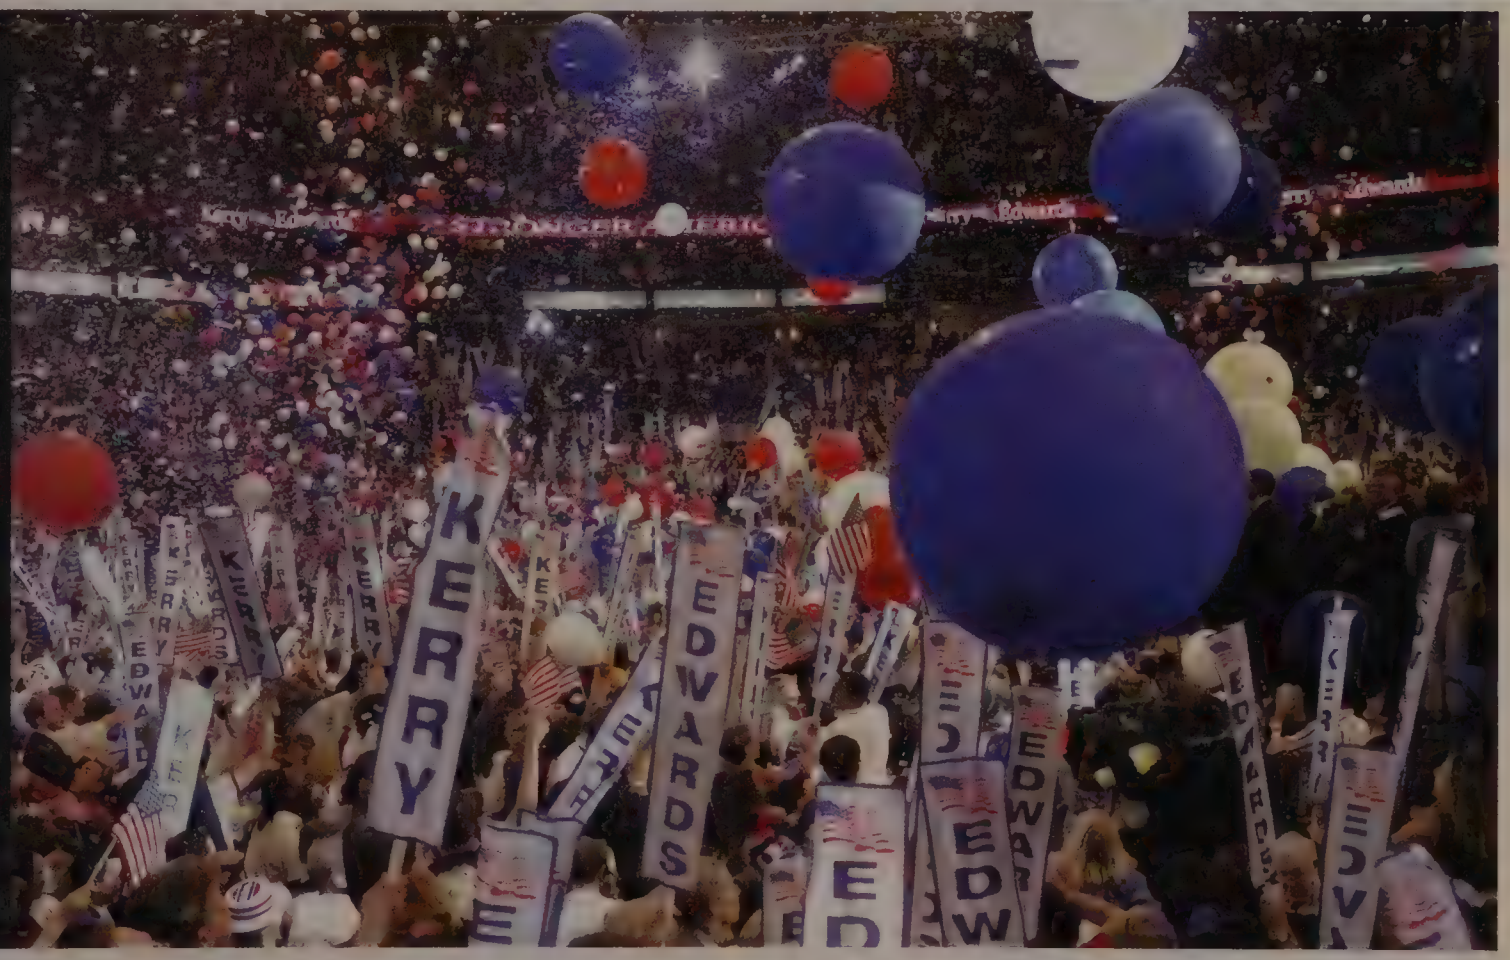
BY EZRA DYER

THE SOX TAKE CARE OF BUSINESS

Unfortunately for the Patriots, 2004 will never go down in Boston sports lore as the Year the Pats Won It Again. No, 2004 belongs to the Sox, who chose the Year of the Monkey to make monkeys of the Bronx Bombers and bodyslam the bad karma that had the club pinned to the mat for 86 years. The whole thing was surreal, from Pedro's hair to Kapler's and Damon's jersey numbers spelling "1918" when they stood side-by-side in the field, to Schilling leaning on his crutch at the victory parade. Now, program your iPod with the following songs to relive the glory of the 2004 postseason. For the ALDS, you need "Fallen Angel," by Poison. For the ALCS, it's "Mama Said Knock You Out," by LL Cool J. And to sum up the World Series, download "Beating the St. Louis Cardinals Like Redheaded Stepchildren," by...um...Annie Lennox. OK, so we made that last one up. But that "Merry Frickin' Christmas" Red Sox song is just too dumb.



CAUSEWAY STREET T TRACKS NO MORE

Sure, the Central Artery gets all the attention, but what about the MBTA's work on Causeway Street? Pedestrians who walk past the FleetCenter saw the light last year as the grimy elevated Green Line T tracks and North Station platform were dismantled, replaced by the new underground "Super Platform" near Canal Street. Cabbies might be disappointed, as there will soon be fewer pedestrians for them to clip or morbidly frighten (the Super Platform will connect to the FleetCenter through a tunnel). But the area's entertainers and entrepreneurs are psyched that their favorite street has become a brighter, sunnier place to drum on buckets and scalp Celtics tickets.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION

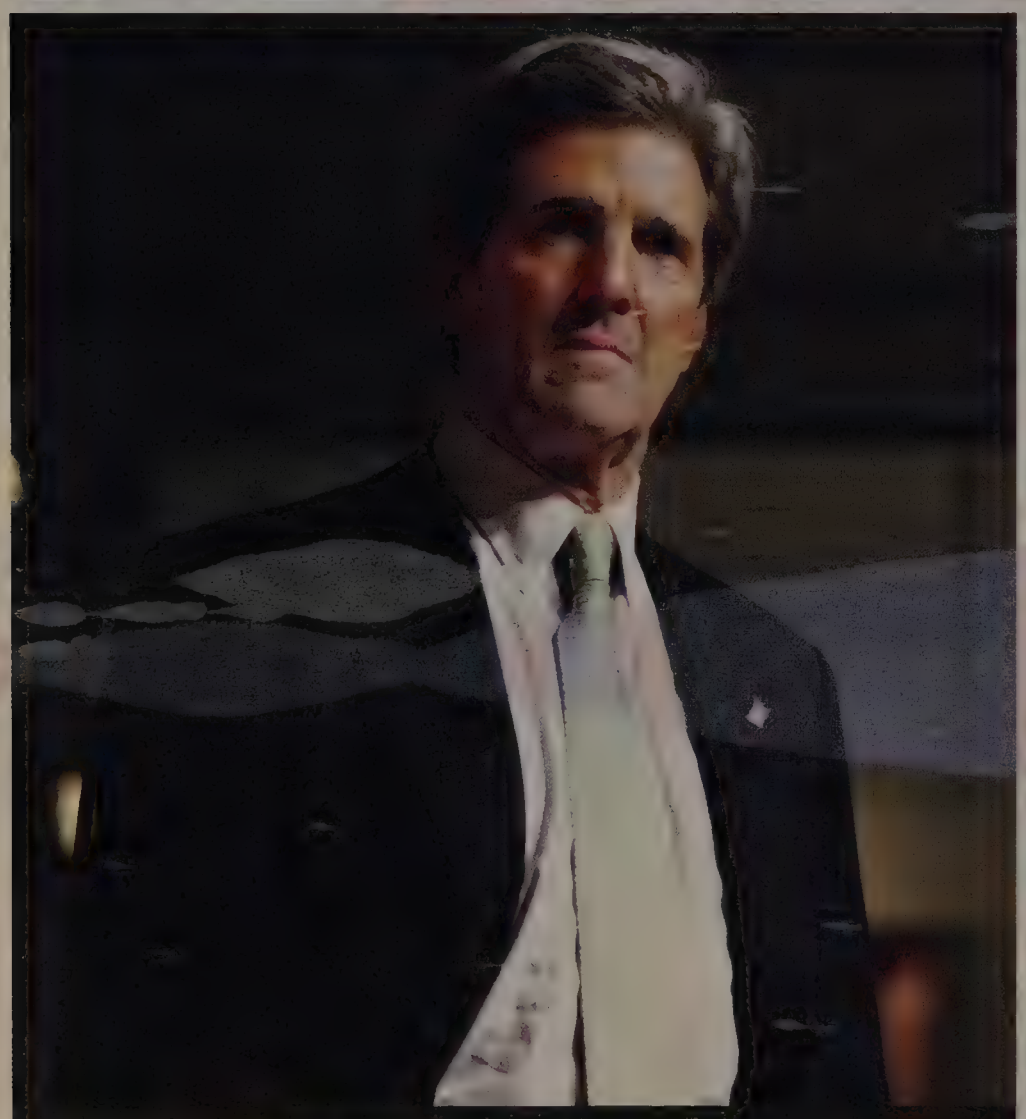
Up until the day it actually began on July 26, nobody could figure out what impact the DNC would have on the city. Would it be an economic bonanza? A constant traffic jam? Why build a huge convention center near the waterfront and then hold the city's biggest event in the FleetCenter? Citywide, Bostonians decided that the answer to these questions was: screw it, I'm going on vacation. Despite the influx of delegates and media, the DNC made Boston look about as populous as post–ice age New York in The Day After Tomorrow. Commuters not only found clear roads, but could get out of their cars and picnic in the HOV lane on I-93. Tumbleweeds rolled past local restaurants unlucky enough to have been left off the party planners' schedules. Walking around the city was like going to work on Thanksgiving—everyone was somewhere else. Whether or not you think the DNC was a success, we can probably all agree that if you want to reap an economic bonus by attracting 30,000 visitors to the city, it's simpler to just let Jimmy Buffett play a concert at Fenway Park.

THE BIG DIG BECOMES THE BIG SIEVE

Just when commuters were getting used to the idea of being stuck in traffic in a tunnel instead of being stuck in traffic on an elevated highway, along comes another curveball in the public works soap opera that is the Big Dig: The tunnels are leaking. This is not a good thing for tunnels to do, unless you're Bruce Willis in Die Hard 3 and you need to surf on the roof of a dump truck and get blown through a manhole to meet Samuel L. Jackson and thwart the terrorists. We recommend that commuters watch that movie and study Willis' moves in the dump truck-surfing scene a few times per year. You know, just in case.

BANK OF AMERICA COMES TO TOWN

Bank of America totally pinkie-swore when they bought Fleet that they wouldn't have massive layoffs. Then, when the deal went through, there weren't massive layoffs...there were super-massive layoffs! And some Fleet employees who weren't laid off were forced to move to company headquarters in North Carolina, an awful place where you can play golf year-round and a 4,000-square-foot house costs as much as a two-bedroom condo in Boston. Are there any winners here? Yes, you, John Q. Customer, reap the rewards of banking with a colossus. First of all, Bank of America has free coffee, whereas Fleet just had lollipops. More important, Bank of America employees are required to be preternaturally friendly or else they receive an electric shock from a manager watching via closed-circuit TV. And nothing makes banking fun like forced friendliness. Mark down 2004 as the year Boston's biggest bank turned its frown upside down!



CONVENTION CENTER COMPLETED

Stardate 2004. Captain to the bridge: We've completed construction of the biggest starship yet seen in the fleet. She's docked down by the waterfront. She's not too quick, but we think she's got what it takes to host a gigantic dentists' convention or two. We call her the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. What? The Hynes? The Hynes is amateur hour, baby. The Hynes is done. Yeah, we heard the Hynes is hosting a big convention next year—a loser convention! Ha ha ha ha! Please, hold your convention at the new place. Please.

PATS WIN THEIR SECOND SUPER BOWL

Just when you thought the Patriots could never replicate the excitement of their 2002 Super Bowl win, when Adam Vinatieri kicked a last-second field goal to ice the championship, the Pats won their second title in the waning seconds on...an Adam Vinatieri field goal! With a fresh title banner flying at the Razor, Patriots fan cockiness reached an all-time high in 2004. And why not? Even with so many injuries that Pat the Patriot is playing right tackle and those guys with the muskets are blocking on punt returns, da Pats just keep winning. Also, importantly, all the New York teams stink. 2004 was a good year to be a Flying Elvis fan.

JOHN KERRY'S PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Over intermittent periods, Beacon Hill's own windsurfing, ketchup-loving senator looked like he might have what it takes to go all the way to the White House, adding a presidential victory to Boston's football and baseball triumphs. But it was not to be, and the crowd assembled in Copley Square anticipating a rowdy party instead got only an uninspiring mumble from John Edwards, followed by a rude awakening the next morning—the electoral college map looked redder than Ted Kennedy's face after a balloon-inflating competition. The reason for this is obvious: The rest of the country is jealous of us because of the Super Bowl and World Series, and they couldn't handle the thought of us winning the White House Bowl too. In the end, it seems, John Kerry was an innocent victim of Boston's friggin' awesomeness.

A GAY OLD MARRIAGE

Someday, a grandpa will sit a little moppet on his lap and tell her about his wedding back in 2004, when he made his vows to grandpa. And the protests that accompanied the legalization of gay marriage in Massachusetts will seem rather silly, because by then people will be marrying animals, and animals will be marrying trees, and it all started down the slippery slope of gay marriage in Massachusetts in 2004, we tell ya! Actually, we're waiting for 2005, when the first round of gay divorces brings another judicial firestorm, this time over whether the bottom gets the alimony.

HOCKEY, OR A LACK THEREOF

History will record 2004 as a black year for Boston hockey. First, the Bruins choked on their sticks in the playoffs. Then they got no chance to redeem themselves because of the NHL lockout. Oh well. It could be worse. Imagine how they feel in Canada, where there's now officially no reason to go on living. IB Bored with the usual cocktail or dinner gatherings? These ideas can add some life to your party.

1154 Lill Studio on Newbury Street hosts handbag-making parties for 12 to 25 people.

BY LARYN IVY

PHOTOGRAPHS BY MICHAEL IVINS

Although most everyone looks forward to the holiday season's whirlwind of parties, by the end of December, the black dress cocktail party can get a little tired. Believe it or not, here in Boston, there are plenty of fun (and we don't mean hokey) and unique alternatives for getting friends together—from a Vegas-style gambling night to a "futuristic" cocktail party complete with a psychic offering readings. So mix it up during the holidays, or after, with some of these no-black-dress- and no-punch-bowl-required events. Long after the start of the New Year, when memories of December's gatherings are just a blur, your party will be sure to stand out.

Diamonds may be a girl's best friend, but for many women, handbags run a close second. At 1154 Lill Studio, your girlfriends can have a party while each of you custom-designs a purse, combining one of 21 styles with any of the shop's hundreds of unique fabrics. Lill, which opened last winter on Newbury Street, books parties for 12 to 25 people Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Saturday nights after store hours. Guests mingle over wine and food provided by the hostess (who receives an Anna William gift certificate for organizing the party). Then, store stylists talk about the bags and help guests choose the design and fabrics. There's no fee for the party, and handbag prices range from $25 to $150, depending on the design.

Anna William, a custom handbag store in Cambridge, also offers in-store parties for seven to 40 people, during or after business hours. In either case, hostesses and their guests are welcome to bring food and drinks. If you prefer, store staff will bring bag designs and fabric samples to your home. Anna William offers 19 bag designs and more than 200 fabrics, and prices range from $22 to $110 (the hostess receives a $78 credit toward her bag). Keep in mind that at both 1154 Lill and Anna William, it takes about four weeks to create the bag you design.

If you like the sound of make-your-own, but purses aren't your bag, get your girlfriends together for a night of jewelry-making. Beadworks stores in Boston and Cambridge host small parties (maximum of eight people) and also provide kits ($20 each) for larger groups for at-home parties. You can book a party in the Boston store for a Tuesday night or Sunday morning, or schedule a Saturday afternoon or Wednesday night in the Cambridge location. At the two-hour-long event, guests receive instructions and enough beads to assemble a necklace, a bracelet and beaded earrings. Kits include freshwater pearls, Swarovski crystal beads and seed beads in a variety of seasonal colors, as well as stringing materials, clasps and hooks. The stores don't allow alcohol at their parties, but food and nonalcoholic beverages are OK. The fee for a party is $40, plus $20 per person for the jewelry kits.

At Rugg Road Paper Co., a group of up to 10 friends can get together to learn skills from wrapping presents to making lampshades. Events are custom-designed, so there's plenty of flexibility in planning the evening. At a quick, one-hour party, guests can receive instruction on card making or present wrapping for about $10 per person (plus the cost of materials selected). A more intensive, two- to three-hour workshop on album-making includes instruction and materials, for about $45–$70 per person (excluding paper for an outside cover). Hosts may bring hors d'oeuvres, wine and music for the festivities. Rugg Road can also bring the party to you—all you need is enough table space for your guests.

Most guys won't get charged up about a handmade-paper-album party, but the chance to roll the dice at the craps table is another story. Gambling is illegal in Massachusetts, of course, but Monte Carlo Productions re-creates a casino experience, complete with play money. The Lynn-based company runs gambling nights for groups of 20 to more than 300 people. The typical evening starts with a cocktail hour, after which the tables—blackjack, craps and roulette are the most popular options—open up. The professional dealers are trained in all the games, and each guest receives $2,000 in play money to use at the tables. Monte Carlo owner Scot Johnson suggests using a gambling party to learn new games, tips and strategies from the dealers, something you can't do at a real casino. Gambling lasts around two hours, then the tables close, the money is counted, tally sheets recorded and, if you choose, prizes awarded to the big winners. The cost for an event depends on travel time and the number of dealers and tables. Johnson estimates that a party for 30 at a Boston apartment would run about $475, including two blackjack tables, one roulette table, three dealers plus chips, play money and other accessories.

Looking for something more physical? Head to the batting cages. Baseball Unlimited in Waltham has five indoor, heated cages available for rent by the half hour ($30/cage) or the hour ($50/cage). The machines are completely adjustable, so if you're up for taking a Schilling-esque 95 mph fastball, you have the option. And if Little League is more your speed, the machines can be set as low as 20 mph. Instructors are available—$50 a half hour or $90 an hour—to provide tips on fielding, pitching, hitting and catching. The rental fee includes bats, helmets and as many balls as you can hit. There's no catering, but Baseball Unlimited lets you bring in your own food and drinks to fuel your swings.

You can take your swing in a different direction at City Golf on Bromfield Street. Its training and practice facility has six hitting bays and two simulators, plus video swing analysis equipment and four PGA pros on staff. Bring a group of 10 to 75 people for a golf party and use the simulators for a closest-to-the-pin or long-drive contest. Or you can have a pro set up in one of the hitting bays to give instruction. Prices vary depending on number of people, the duration of the party, catering (City Golf can arrange for food from nearby restaurants like Sebastian's and Silvertone) and number of pros on duty. Director of marketing Justin LaMontagne estimates that a two-hour party for 15 people with catering, two pros and access to all the facilities would run between $1,200 and $1,500.

If you like the idea of a dinner party but don't want to cook or shop or even clean up, for that matter, A Fresh Endeavor can make that dream a reality, and you and your guests can learn something new to boot. This personal-chef and in-house-catering service creates a unique dinner party by providing a chef to lead a cooking class and prepare food in your own kitchen. Owners Christine Robinson and Dennis Nosko work with you to plan a menu for the evening—they can handle high-end French to Mexican cuisine and everything in between. They'll do the shopping, run a cooking class while preparing the meal, and clean up afterwards. Guests participate as much or as little as they like in the cooking, and the chefs offer helpful hints on ingredients and techniques. The flat rate of $575 for nights and weekends includes one hour of planning/shopping time and four hours with the chefs in your home. It's $125 per extra hour, and groceries are an additional fee. Guests have dinner at your house and leave with new recipes and inside tips, and you don't even have to do the dishes.

Finally, here's an idea for spicing up your standard cocktail party: Add a fortune teller or other medium to your guest list. The Tremont Tearoom has psychics on staff who read tarot cards, tea leaves and palms. For $100 per hour, a psychic will come to your home (or other location) and read your friends' futures. Tea leaves and palmistry provide general readings, or you can opt for a tarot card reader, which manager Peter Blocker says works best for a bigger party, as guests can ask specific questions. For a smaller party (minimum of six people) the psychic provides half-hour readings at a rate of $50 per person. This way, even a small informal gathering with friends can be memorable. IB ake and Susan are an average young New York couple out for a fancy night on the town, starting at the coolest new restaurant in the city. Jake slips the maitre d' a little something, to get the best table possible. "But of course, sir," the tuxedoed gent replies with a gracious smile. "If you'll just follow me." He turns a corner, and Jake and Susan find themselves facing the best seat in the house, a luxurious double bed?! "It's the latest thing, I assure you, madame," the maitre d' murmurs, as he pulls back the covers for Susan. She and Jake make themselves comfortable, and a waiter approaches with menus. They can't keep from chuckling. "Only in New York," Susan laughs. "Only in New York," Jake agrees.

But is that really true? For decades—centuries, even—Boston has languished in the shadow of its notorious neighbor to the south. The center of world culture and a wellspring of styles, fashions and trends, New York's cachet as the locus of all things hip remains unchallenged (look who gave us those ridiculous Mark Jacobs moon boots). Recently, however, Boston has not only been on top of the latest trends—the posh local eatery Mantra recently added a bed to its lounge—but also blazing some new trails of its own. So dig the following new and exciting trends and lifestyles that we may soon be able to import or export (or just outright ban).

TREND THAT'S...HERE TO STAY? HARD TO SAY

Bikeshaws

The pedi-cab, which seemed like such a good idea (especially during the Democratic National Convention, when they were first introduced to Boston en masse) seems to have all but disappeared. Many cities, like New York, London and Amsterdam have welcomed these modern-day rickshaws (imagine a horse and buggy crossed with a bike messenger's rig). But the word is, Boston city officials made some fiscally prohibitive demands on this fledgling industry, and the fate of the bicycle cab in Boston remains uncertain. All we can say is, (at least during the few months when weather permits) Boston could use a few more stylish late-night travel options, especially ones that don't add to congestion—of the roads or the lungs.

TREND THAT BLENDS REALITY TV WITH THE DRUNKEN OFFICE NIGHT OUT

Movieoke

So you know Monty Python's Life of Brian by heart? You can do Marlon Brando's "I coulda been a contendah" speech word for word? Finally there's a way to flex your useless skill. Movieoke allows would-be thespians to strut their stuff in front of their friends without suffering through boring night classes or paying lengthy dues in community theater. All you have to do is drink enough to get up the guts to read lines from a monitor, just like with karaoke. Meanwhile, your movie of choice runs on the screen while you act out your role, your voice is dubbed in over the audio, and presto: You're a contender after all! Unfortunately, you'll have to take a weekend trip to the Big Apple or start a local letter-writing campaign. Boston doesn't have the movieoke hookup just yet.

TREND THAT NEW YORK CAN JUST HANG ON TO, THANKS

Cuddle parties

There are some New York–based trends that Boston has turned away at the border. "Cuddle parties," the brainchild of a pair of "relationship coaches," have so far been given a cordial "um, we'll pass" by Bostonians. A gathering of pajama-clad wallflowers for the purpose of exploring friendly, intimate physical contact (but emphatically without a sexual element) seems like a fun idea to base a Seinfeld episode around, but that's about as far as it goes. Frankly, once you start to take the idea of "relationship coaching" seriously, there's not that much further to go before you've jumped feet-first into fantasyland. We're not really sure cuddle parties are worth spending much more than a paragraph on, but who knows? Maybe they'll be the next big thing in Boston. And maybe Mayor Menino will start schlepping tourists around on a bike.

TREND WE CAN'T QUITE PUT OUR FINGER ON

Asexuals

This crowd of not-interested-thank-yous is making its presence more visible through Web sites such as Asexuality.org and news stories on CNN and in magazines like Details and New Scientist. One can only hope that, given its currently progressive attitude, Massachusetts will be the site of the first asexual marriage. Or, to be more accurate, the first openly asexual marriage. Still we have to wonder, are these folks campaigning for equal rights in the workplace? ("I demand to not look at Internet porn on company time!") Protected status for their unconventional asexual practices? ("What I don't do in the privacy of my own bedroom is my business!") Nonreproductive freedom? ("I support a woman's right to choose not to have sex with me!") According to Asexuality.org, there's a regular meeting of Boston asexuals on the first Saturday of every month. It's a small group, but that's just because nobody brings a date.

TREND THAT SHOULD HURRY UP AND GET TO BOSTON ALREADY

The Nap Pod

Another NYC novelty that we hear is navigating northward is the Nap Pod. This productivity-boosting gadget looks like a cross between a giant motorcycle helmet and a massage table. A cushy, stylish black recliner, long enough to stretch out on (for a recommended 20 minutes) extends from a large, bulbous white sphere that more or less encloses the sleeper's shoulders and head. With the optional "privacy visor" (which your boss really should spring for), the Nap Pod becomes a cocoon-like capsule, ready to blast you off into the naposphere. Now the pod is of course meant for single-person use. But when we look at it, all we can think is office-party after-party, if you catch our meaning. It might not be a bad idea to give your cushy Nap Pod the Windex treatment the morning after the holiday festivities at your place of business.

TREND WE COULD REALLY USE RIGHT NOW, MAN

Nicotine cocktails

Ever wish you could get around the antismoking laws in restaurants and bars? Well, the owners of joints like NYC's Suba must have had that in mind when they introduced drinks like the Nicotini, a martini that also quells the craving for a coffin nail. Providing the convenience and luxury of satiating your addiction without going outside and freezing your lighter-finger off, nicotine drinks are ever so much classier than a cheekful of tobacco (plus, you don't have to spit them out every few minutes).

TREND WE CAN SEE LOOMING (BUT CAN'T HEAR)

Silent dating

With silent dating, speed-dating's shier cousin, mum's the word. The challenge of hitting it off using mime and/or a pad of paper seems to appeal to singles who are sick of small talk. Invented in New York City by a pair of audio-sensitive socialites, these "quiet parties" have proven wildly popular there (as well as in London, Chicago and Washington, D.C.). They offer the opportunity to see what your prospective date brings to the table when he or she can't fall back on "So, seen any good reality TV shows lately?" A picture is, after all, worth a thousand words, and we can certainly remember dates where we wished we could slap a gag order on a dinnertime dullard and cut to the slide show.

TREND WE'RE CONFIDENT BOSTON WILL WHOLEHEARTEDLY EMBRACE

World Series championship

Last but not least, there's the trend that's been synonymous with the Big Apple for years. It's a time-honored tradition that New Yorkers have almost taken for granted, and which, to them, has come to signify a ritual only slightly more important than, say, the Thanksgiving Day parade, or the shelving of the white wing tips after Labor Day. But for fans in other cities, particularly Boston, it's far more crucial to the enjoyment of life itself. This is one New York City custom that Boston can proudly commandeer. IB

WHEN THE INVITATION SPECIFIES BLACK-TIE, FOLLOW OUR TIPS AND BE A STYLISH STANDOUT IN A SEA OF PENGUINS.

THE FINE ART OF FORMAL WEAR

PRODUCED BY SAMANTHA HOUSE
PHOTOGRAPHED BY JOE GREENE

Black velvet jacket by Armani Collezioni, $1,895; black pants by Armani Collezioni, $495; striped shirt by Paul Smith, $215; burgundy tie by Paul Smith, $125. All at Neiman Marcus.
Tarawa watch in stainless steel by Ebel, $2,950 at DeScenza Diamonds.

Black suit, $1,095; blue shirt, $195; silver tie, $135. All by Z Zegna, all at Ermenegildo Zegna. Automatic strap watch by Movado, $850 at DeScenza Diamonds.

Times have changed quite a bit since the roaring '20s, when a basic black tuxedo was the standard menswear for any formal occasion. Nowadays, men have more options, but a tux remains the ultimate in formal style.

When it comes to black-tie attire, there are a few things for men to remember. First is fabric. Whether you're buying or renting, a wool tuxedo is always the best choice—it looks more sophisticated and lasts quite a bit longer than the polyester alternative. As for the cut, double-breasted is now considered passé, as are tails on a tux jacket. Instead, go for simple jacket styles like two- or three-button versions.

Pants are pretty straightforward: Flat-fronts are in style and will also make you look taller than pleated pants do. (Only men over six feet tall should ever attempt pleats, though flat-fronts are still the more stylish option.)

While you should follow those simple rules for the suit itself, there's a little room for creativity when you're choosing a shirt. Collars can range from wide to sleek, and you can even opt for prints and textures.

Shoes should be black, but you don't have to go with the traditional patent leather. Whatever you do, though, don't ruin the look with shoes that are too casual.

A basic tuxedo won't make you a trend-setter, but you will look dapper. Chicks routinely swoon for a man in black tie, so don't worry about whether everyone else will be wearing one too. If you're ready to be a little more daring, however, consider the following options:

The basic tux with a twist. You can play around with different styles to make your tux more versatile. Try mixing a colored shirt with a funky tie instead of sporting the typical bow tie with white tuxedo shirt.

Black suit with tie and dress shirt. A black suit is an acceptable alternative to a tuxedo. Choose a tie with a little sheen, and a dress shirt, or even a traditional tuxedo shirt and black bow tie, to finish off the look.

Push the envelope. Ready to set free your inner rock star? Try a tux in velvet or a fabric with a sheen to it. Since these looks are so unique, you can wear them with a shirt and tie or skip the tie and wear your shirt open. Top it off with cuff links and tuxedo studs and you're on your way to a memorable evening.

Black jacket by Ted Baker, $695; black pinstriped pants by Ted Baker, $275; white tuxedo shirt by Ermenegildo Zegna, $245. All at Bloomingdale's.

CALLING ALL BAD BOYS

Puff*, by Bob Flaherty—writer, cartoonist, comedian—follows two brothers' hysterical escapades in Boston during the Blizzard of '78. Flaherty lives with his wife "who seems to understand him," and his three sons.

If you tend to look with a sympathetic eye at mischievous kids' irreverent chipping-away at life's absurdities, read Puff. Working-class Catholic brothers John and Gully, who live near Boston with a father who "distribs" newspapers, are two such young men, their childhoods characterized by drawing "fat naked nuns in chalk on the walls of the rectory garage" as the enraged Monsignor of St. Ukelele's, with his "immense steak-colored face" rages after them. During the Blizzard of '78, as their mother lies dying, these lads manically charge through the snowstorm to score a bag of pot. During this caper, they impersonate Red Cross personnel before hatching an idea. Flaherty writes: "'I think we should break into the school,' I declared, the words hanging in the frigid air like underpants on a line." There, the boys transgress nakedly and hilariously with a sarcastic charmer, Gally, a girl John has longed for since childhood. There are also marvelously raw and raunchy priests in the book, and Flaherty tells the tale in such a loose, merry, naughty-boy-grown-up style that his mother's death tucks itself into the book gracefully.

LESSONS IN BECOMING AUDREY HEPBURN

UdefineU is a series of four DVDs that serve as a "finishing school in a box." Designed by a formerly overweight woman who wanted to deploy her svelte self more elegantly, the set costs $99. Call 877-333-4638 or go to www.udefineu.com.

In a style that's almost touchingly crisp and formal, these four videos go about teaching women "the foundations of grace and elegance." In each segment, a cheery, elegantly dressed woman, standing up inspiringly straight, interviews another glamorous professional woman regarding posture and poise, voice and speech, etiquette and fundamentals of style. In one video, a speech coach discusses the elements of melodious speaking, showing us a range of vocal ugliness to be avoided—including voices that are monotonous, harsh, nasal, mumbling, bossy and overbearing, or thin and childlike—and suggests corrective exercises. Throughout, the negative impressions—let alone damaged self-esteem—resulting from gauchery, nonstylish dressing, slouchiness, and uncouth or just uninformed table manners is emphasized. Ballerina Maria Vardeja, gorgeous as a gazelle, demonstrates just how effective erect posture can be when one employs a soft airiness of movement; balletic grace in everyday life. Formal or professional table manners require an exacting and artful geometry and choreography of fork, knife and napkin that you might well not know. Fashion designer Victoria Lopez-Castro offers extremely stringent wardrobe direction; only six "pieces," subtly shuffled.

OPEN A BOOK IN A NEWLY OPENED BOOKSTORE.

Porter Square Books is a new independent bookstore in the Porter Square Shopping Center, next to Tags in the former Dress Barn space. Call 617-491-2220.

Just as Wordsworth has sadly shut its doors in Harvard Square after 28 years, Cambridge has been compensated with the opening of another independent bookstore. Porter Square Books' inviting, cheerfully painted, 3,600-square-foot space includes tables in cozy, library-like areas where you can schmooze with the lit. Some of the homey furniture comes from the nearby store Home, run by the lively Dorinda Jaquith—who also works here. Fiction, mystery, history, sci-fi, biography, art, photography, poetry—good books abound. And you won't find indoor skyscrapers built of Danielle Steel in this shop. Many interesting writers live nearby—among them Margot Livesey, Mameve Medwed, Gish Jen—their apples falling not far from their respective trees. The eclectic staff has "100 years of experience" in bookstores, corporate life, poetry, and in mutual friendship which lends a neighborhood feeling even in a shopping center. The children's area is slated to offer story hours, adding to the store's festive, neighborly vibe.

REVIEW

LOFTY AMBITIONS IN ORIENT HEIGHTS

Zafferano's uncompromising, affordable Italian food is worth the trek to East Boston.

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY BERTA A. DANIELS

For many Bostonians, East Boston is almost terra incognito. Logan Airport, while located in East Boston, is not really of it, and most visitors to the airport confine themselves to the tunnels and highway ramps leading to the terminals, bypassing the area's neighborhoods. Once strongly Italian-American in ethnic flavor, East Boston has become increasingly diversified, with Caribbean, Latin American and Asian arrivals making their presence known in their colorful, lively restaurants and shops. For many of the neighborhoods of East Boston, however, an Italian flavor persists, and nowhere more than in Orient Heights, at a charming new restaurant called Zafferano at the corner of Saratoga and Bennington streets, not far from the Winthrop town line.

Crisp white tablecloths and napkins dress comfortably spaced tables for two, four or six. Peach walls are illuminated with Victorian sconces and festooned with framed photographs of Grottaminarda, a small town in the hills of Campagna to the east of Naples. Delightful recorded music, including Italian opera and Neapolitan songs, drowns out the sound from the nearby T and low-flying aircraft.

Zafferano's menu is reasonably priced, with most appetizers in the single digits, many main courses under $20, and wine selections starting below $20 a bottle. The consumer-friendly prices should not mislead one into thinking this to be a casual, bargain bistro, however. Rather, it's a serious, substantial restaurant in which a dedicated owner-chef starts with first-rate ingredients and treats them with the respect that is the hallmark of good Italian cooking, rendering them into memorable dishes that please the palate and warm the soul.

Spinacini con noci al miele, balsamico e Gorgonzola ($7) proved a light and refreshing starter, with young, tender spinach leaves and huge, crunchy walnut halves bathed in a honey-sweetened balsamic vinaigrette enriched with crumbled Gorgonzola cheese that provided a welcome tangy counterpoint. A more substantial antipasto, trofeo di melanzane ($7), brought two thick slices of sautéed eggplant combined with fresh mozzarella and a well balanced tomato sauce. While not quite justifying its graphic name, translated as "tower of eggplant," the combination of earthy eggplant, lively tomato sauce and creamy mozzarella with the lingering flavor of fruity oil in which the eggplant had been sautéed made the dish a Mediterranean flavor holiday.

Gamberoni alla costiera con zafferano*—jumbo shrimp sautéed in a saffron and limoncello sauce

Antipasto Zafferano ($11), a large platter of silky Parma prosciutto, spicy salami, grilled eggplant and zucchini bathed in aromatic, extra-virgin olive oil, luscious olives, fresh mozzarella and aged provolone, touched all the bases of classic Italian antipasti in fine fashion, save the flavorless hothouse tomatoes that would have been better omitted. A special appetizer one evening, fagottino mozzarella ($7), a little bundle of firm asparagus buried beneath a velvety blanket of melted mozzarella, arrived warm from the oven, the cheese enhancing but not overshadowing the fresh flavor of the asparagus. Finally, the zuppa di vongole e cannellini ($11) turned out to be substantial enough to serve as a main course. This mountain of littleneck clams, steamed in their own juice with garlic, olive oil, and tomato, exchanged flavors with toothsome white cannellini beans that contributed substance and savor to the ensemble.

Zafferano's primi (pasta courses) actually surpassed the elevated expectations generated by the appetizers. Garganelli noci, speck e zafferano ($14) reprised the chef's use of walnuts in the salad, combining them with nuggets of pleasantly smoky, salty German ham and a touch of saffron to dress a generous portion of ziti-like pasta, appropriately al dente in texture. Even better were a duo of pasta preparations offered on the menu with penne (for which the house, at my request, substituted two of its homemade longer pastas, for a $2 surcharge per dish). As a result of the substitutions, penne pulcinella became tagliolini pulcinella ($14). These long spaghetti-like noodles dressed with red and green peppers, onions, vibrantly flavored fresh basil, and plum tomatoes combined superlative flavor with first-rate texture. The dish that became papardelle boscaiolla ($15) brought broad, flat, fresh noodles dressed with peas, mushrooms, Italian ham, onions and tomato, and replicated the perfect, resilient texture of the tagliolini, this time enriched with the medley of flavors and textures provided by the mushrooms, peas and ham.

Although it wasn't on the menu, the waiter brought a salad of arugula and baby spinach with a well-balanced vinaigrette between the primi and main courses. The latter ranged from a superb grigliata di carne mista (mixed grill, $25) to gamberoni alla costiera con zafferano (sautéed jumbo shrimp with limoncello and saffron, $22) to pollo al Gorgonzola (chicken breast with zucchini, carrots and Gorgonzola cheese, $16), with an off-the-menu special one evening of grilled veal chop ($26). The superb mixed grill consisted of two thick and succulent lamb chops, a small, tender and robustly flavorful sirloin steak, and a spicy, satisfying sausage redolent of fennel and sage. The other main courses did not quite attain the high standards of the antipasti and pastas. Most disappointing was the chicken dish, in which the flavor of the carrots and zucchini clashed with the assertive Gorgonzola, suggesting that this was a better combination on paper than on the plate. Better were the shrimp, with perfect texture and agreeable, if not memorable, flavor. Surprisingly, the promised saffron was almost undetectable, lending neither its distinctive color, aroma nor flavor to the dish, despite the fact that the restaurant takes its name from the Italian word for this aromatic spice. The veal chop, a standard premium offering at Italian restaurants and steakhouses alike, arrived rare and juicy, but for some reason had been cut into sections in the kitchen, perhaps on the assumption that our party would be sharing it and needed the assistance. This presentation detracted from the impact that this regal dish can make, but the accompanying sautéed mushrooms, moistened in the delicious sauce rendered from a reduction of the cooking juices, rescued the dish.

Zafferano's desserts ($6) included a first-rate tiramisu served in a large dish shaped like a martini glass. Dusted with powdered, unsweetened cocoa on top, it combined ladyfingers soaked in pleasantly bitter coffee and mildly sweet mascarpone cheese, and unlike many tiramisus was not drowned in liquor. A fruittino (Italian fruit cake) contained candied fruits, blueberries, strawberries and kiwi, and in contrast with traditional dense, heavy English fruitcake, was light and refreshing on the palate.

From Zafferano's very reasonably priced wine list, we chose a Zaldetti prosecco ($20), a charming sparkler whose restrained sweetness and lively effervescence made it the perfect aperitif. In a gesture too often lacking in restaurants when they serve a white or sparkling wine from the lower-priced end of their lists, our waiter brought a silver-plated ice bucket to keep the prosecco chilled. To go with our robustly flavored food, we chose the Plaio Primativo ($19) from Apuglia, at Italy's heel, a grapey, simple wine with sufficient structure to make it a decent food companion. A single glass of the house Chianti ($4.50) provided a slightly drier alternative at a remarkable price.

The earnest, congenial husband-and-wife proprietors of Zafferano, Pietro and Pina Del Viscovo, bring a passion and drive for perfection to their engaging eatery. Pina runs the front of the house with Mediterranean grace and warmth, while Pietro brings a passionate commitment to quality and authenticity to his kitchen. A friend called this restaurant to my attention, comparing it to the ill-fated trattoria of the film Big Night, which chronicled the attempt of a pair of Italian brothers to create a restaurant of excellence and authenticity in a New Jersey suburb, only to founder on their own uncompromising integrity. I was dismayed at the paucity of patrons on both nights I visited Zafferano, one a weekday and one a Friday evening, and I feared for its future. On the other hand, once lovers of honest Italian food learn of its merits and value, not to mention the fact that it is a three-minute walk from the Orient Heights T station, word of mouth should empower Zafferano to attract the attention and patronage it deserves. Dining in the Dark

A simple proposition

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

Here's the situation: Several very fine chefs have been AWOK—absent without a kitchen—for some time now. All want to open their own restaurant. Ed Doyle has been the culinary equivalent of a pop-up ad (albeit much more welcome) around town since leaving Aura at the Seaport Hotel. Steve Johnson, formerly of the Blue Room, continues to scope out locations in Cambridge, when he's not fishing in Westport. Carmen Quagliatta, formerly of the Vault, had almost all his ducks in a row for an Italian restaurant in the suburbs, before his flight was grounded at the last minute.

It's expensive to open a restaurant. You have to court investors, negotiate real estate deals, hire an architect or designer, buy lots of equipment and decor, and that's before you even serve a single diner. So here's a suggestion: Chefs already travel overseas to gain culinary inspiration and bring back new dishes for their menus. Now they could think outside the icebox by visiting, for example, one of several European restaurants that plunge diners into absolute darkness to replicate blindness. In Paris, the City of Light, Dans le Noir features blind waiters, a choice of Provencal fare or a "mystery menu," a bar and lounge, wine tastings, and mixers. Run by two entrepreneurs and a major association for the blind in France, Dans le Noir offers diners the opportunity to sharpen their senses and focus on conversation. The concept also offers restaurateurs the opportunity to save big bucks on decor and tabletop—not to mention electricity—and the time and expense of garnishes. Note: this may be the only restaurant in Paris that forbids smoking. Cell phones, watches and anything else that may shed light must be checked at the entrance.

A dark horse, you think? Mais non. Four years ago, a similarly themed restaurant called Blinde Kuh ("blind cow") was opened in Zurich by a Swiss foundation for the blind. It has a months-long waiting list. Berlin is home to two such restaurants, as well as a café for the deaf called "Hands Up!" next to the Berlin Center for the Deaf. Most bizarre of all is Berlin's new eatery called Sehnsucht ("longing"), inspired by, and designed for, people with eating disorders. Menu items are described in terms of sensation. Order heisshunger ("ravenous hunger"), for example, and you'll receive rack of lamb. Presented to you by a bulimic waitress. Prepared by an anorexic chef (note: because she's thin, you can save money on kitchen space). Sehnsucht's owner is a recovered anorexic, and the restaurant is attached to an "advice center" that provides a resource for her target demographic. Could this possibly work? Would an "all-you-can-eat" special for bulimics have to be limited to a half hour?

Top: Blinde Kuh, Zurich; bottom: Dans le Noir, Paris

Imagine the concept here. The ADD Diner would have a menu that changes every five minutes. The Food Allergy Bistro would serve EpiPens with the bread basket. Sybil's Multi-Personality Trattoria would provide multiple place settings per person, and automatically split every single check.

Closer to home: Piattini Wine Bar has opened on Columbus Avenue between Arlington and Berkeley streets. Like its Newbury Street sister restaurant, the focus here is on small plates (you know, "piattini"), and a wide variety of wines (30!) by the glass. If you're hungrier, or thirstier, PWB also offers complete entrées, wine by the bottle, and a full bar at lunch and dinner. iB

A WINTER OF WINE

Wintertime in Boston is never easy, but the dreary days are always more tolerable when you can and relax with a glass of wine. This winter, the Boston Harbor Hotel gives everyone a chance to escape the cold and enter the world of cabernets and chardonnays as it embarks on the 16th annual Boston Wine Festival.

Chef Daniel Bruce

Starting with the opening reception on January 7, the hotel hosts up to four wine events a week in its many banquet rooms right up until the April 9 closing ceremony. This year's festival features appearances from well-known wineries such as Robert Mondavi, Penfolds, Stag's Leap and many others.

The opening reception (7 pm, $100) includes a sampling of more than 50 wines from around the world as well as an extensive buffet created by chef Daniel Bruce to complement the various wines.

So unless you made a New Year's resolution to cut back on guzzling the grape, check out www.bostonwinefestival.net for a schedule of events, including the Battle of the Cabernets dinner on January 11 (7 pm, $210).

Music: Homecoming Weekend

If you're looking for a musical alternative to the season's ubiquitous cheery carols, the Perceptionists' upcoming show at the Paradise could fill the bill. A local supergroup made up of Mr. Lif, Akrobatik and DJ Fakts One, this trio's priorities include lambasting political doubletalk and bringing "conscious rap" back to its former prominence. With influences evident from KRS-ONE to A Tribe Called Quest, there's every indication that these Boston natives' soon-to-be-released debut will be one for the history books. Also on the bill is NYC indie rap champ Aesop Rock. Known for his imagery-laden rhymes and distinctive, gruff delivery, Ace Rizzle has charmed hordes of devoted fans into scrutinizing (and memorizing) his every line. Paradise Rock Club, 969 Comm. Ave., Boston (617-423-NEXT). 8 pm, 18+. $20.

Music: Royal Pop Collective Central Square Christmas Party

Cyanide Valentine

Once again, the local radio stations' annual holiday concert events have come and gone. If you missed these extravaganzas for whatever reason (too expensive, too mainstream, too sold out) and are jonesing for a multi-band holiday rock show, the Royal Pop Collective's Christmas Tour 2004 is an alt-rock alternative. Nine of RPC's 200-plus bands and musicians showcase their stuff December 16 at T.T. the Bear's and the Middle East Upstairs. The Middle East show features a lineup of Northeast-based bands, including alt-rockers Aberdeen City, techno pop by Cyanide Valentine (led by the former frontman of the hard-rockin Quick Fix, Jake Zavracky) as well as Faces on Film, Silent Service and MYTVS. At T.T.'s, power-pop outfits Anushka Pop, the Bocks and Orange Park are joined by Malvern's eclectic combo of indie pop and rock. Middle East Upstairs, 472 Mass. Ave., Cambridge; T.T. the Bear's Place, 10 Brookline St., Cambridge (617-931-2000). www.theroyalpop.com. 9 pm. $9 for the Middle East; $10 for the T.T.'s show; $17 for both.

This year's Christmas Revels includes a flying canoe number based on the folktale "La Chasse-Galerie."

Performing Arts: Christmas Revels

For the 34th consecutive year in a row, the Christmas Revels takes to the stage to perform folk songs, carols, musical numbers, skits and dances, all tied around the theme of celebrating the winter solstice. This year's show, directed by Patrick Swanson with music director George Emlen, features a mix of entertainment—from fiddling to clog dancing to spoon playing ("kitchen music"). Introverts beware: The show is interactive. The audience participates in singing carols, and when the traditional "Lord of the Dance" number starts, the spectators jump to their feet to dance through the aisles. New this year is the enactment of the folk tale "La Chasse-Galerie" ("The Flying Canoe"). Sanders Theatre, corner of Kirkland and Quincy streets, Cambridge (617-496-2222). $20–$42. www.revels.org.

SAT./DEC. 18 AND STARTING SUN./JAN. 2

Cityscope: Two Terrific Trolley Tours

One upside of the soon-to-be-frigid weather is the beautification of the city, as lights, wreaths and ornaments adorn the lamp posts, trees and buildings. A couple of seasonal trolley tours offer easy (and fun) ways to see some of the festive frippery. The Illuminations Tour is a 45-minute trolley ride through the streets of Somerville. On December 18, you can see the best Somervilluminations—the over-the-top holiday decorations on many of the city's houses, from giant creches and glowing lawn ornaments to thousands of Christmas lights. After the holidays, you can tour the downtown sights while gorging on baked goods and sweets during Old Town Trolley's Boston Chocolate Tour. This jaunt brings you to the Top of the Hub restaurant (where there's a different chocolate treat every week through April), the Omni Parker House Hotel (where you feast on Boston cream pie) and then to the the mothership, the Langham Hotel Boston, for its insane Chocolate Bar Buffet, to eat as many of the 25 chocolate desserts as you can handle. Illuminations Tour: Somerville City Hall (617-625-6600); Dec. 18, 4:30, 5, 5:45, 6:15, 7, 7:30, 8:15 and 8:45 pm; $5–$10. Chocolate Tour: Jan. 2–April 10, Sat. and Sun., 11:30 am and 12:45 pm; $60 (617-269-3626).

WED./JAN. 5 AND SAT./JAN. 8

CityScope: Hail to the King

Had the King of Rock and Roll lived to celebrate his 70th birthday, he probably would have retired his bedazzling jumpsuits, pompadour and massive aviators long ago. Yet because Elvis "left the building," we get to celebrate his birthday with eternally young, hip-swivelling impersonators, and this year is no different, as three local venues are throwing Elvis birthday bashes. With more than 3,000 performances under his glittery belt, Elvis impersonator Steve Connolly has probably put on as many Elvis shows as the King himself did. The Winchester native returns to Boston for two shows in early January. For his show January 8 at the Berklee Performance Center, which commemorates what would have been Elvis' 70th birthday, a leather-clad Connolly will go all out—he'll be joined by a seven-piece band and the costumed Vegas Dancers. He also performs a toned-down version of the birthday show on the 5th at Boston Rocks, which includes a buffet of Elvis' favorite foods. Meanwhile, Dick's Last Resort puts on its own annual bash for the King on the 8th. Elvis impersonator Mike Viselli performs his Jailhouse Rockin' Musical Tribute to the King and gets the audience to sing along. Dick's also has a slew of competitions: an Elvis look-alike/sound-alike karaoke contest, a jelly donut–eating contest and a Priscilla look-alike contest. Boston Rocks, 245 Quincy Market, Boston (617-726-1110); Jan. 5, 7 pm; no cover. Berklee Performance Center, 136 Mass. Ave., Boston (617-747-2261); Jan. 8, 8 pm; $27.50–$37.50. Dick's Last Resort, 55 Huntington Ave. Boston (617-267-8080); Jan. 8, 8 pm; no cover.

Those '60s Shows

Two new films try to channel the Rat Pack era.

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Back when Frank Sinatra was alive and singing, there was a one-liner that went "It's Frank's world, we just live in it." At the movies this month, you might change that to "Frank's dead, but it's his multiplex." Two new movies hope to channel the casual cool of Camelot-era Sinatra. First, there's Ocean's Twelve, the sequel to the remake of Sinatra's Rat Pack caper picture Ocean's Eleven. Then there's Beyond the Sea, Kevin Spacey's docudrama on the life of Bobby Darin, the versatile entertainer fueled by his drive to be the Sinatra of his generation.

Since Beyond the Sea takes place mostly during the late 1950s and 1960s, it's literally trying to capture the era (dig all those striped cardigans). Darin, played by Spacey, makes for a great example of early-1960s cool, and he also had a versatile career that might never get over today. Since today's marketing dictates that commercial radio stations each play only one type of music and effectively prevents eclectic variety programs like The Ed Sullivan Show from existing, Darin might never get any exposure. His hits ranged from rock ("Splish Splash") to show tunes ("Mack the Knife") to folk ("If I Were a Carpenter") to—like Sinatra's "My Way"—a ballad translated from French ("Beyond the Sea").

Matt Damon, Brad Pitt and George Clooney in Ocean's Twelve

Although it's a loving tribute to Darin and his times, Beyond the Sea fails the ultimate test: unlike The Buddy Holly Story or Ray, it doesn't make you want to run out and buy music by its subject. You can't fault Kevin Spacey for trying; not only does he don a prosthetic nose to play Darin, he directed the movie and sings the songs himself. But even a movie about a "star" needs to establish its hero's entertainment chops, and Beyond the Sea never really does. In skipping over early career details of career—like working as a songwriter in the famed Brill Building and then getting a recording contract—the movie just assumes that we assume Darin is a great talent.

Bad move. Meanwhile, despite Darin's remarkable offstage life—big-time maternal issues, romance with starlet Sandra Dee (Kate Bosworth) and a heart condition that took his life at 37—Beyond the Sea's storytelling is all over the place. There are musical fantasies (yes, Spacey dances) and an occasional abstract touch (as when a narrator appears onstage, only to be shushed by the actors in the next scene), along with more conventional biopic kismet. (Did Darin, born Walden Robert Cassotto, really come up with his stage name when he saw the broken "Mandarin" in a Chinese restaurant's neon sign?) The movie celebrates the fact that, after a down period in which Darin lost faith in his career and the world, he could integrate all of his elements and regain his stardom and happiness. Yet the movie can't integrate all of its own elements.

If Beyond the Sea goes for the same 1960s American cool that Ocean's Eleven sought to update, Ocean's Twelve goes more for the 1960s vibe you might have found at its European locations. Using the zooms and jump cuts of the French New Wave and the European movies it inspired, Steven Soderbergh's sequel sends its band of thieves abroad.

The heist in this caper comedy comes about because the casino owner (Andy Garcia) they robbed the first time around finds out where Danny Ocean (George Clooney) and his cohorts are, and gives them two weeks to pay back the $160 million they stole, plus three years' worth of interest. So we trade Vegas' fake Bellagio for the real thing, with the gang targeting the Fabergé coronation egg on display at a Rome museum. Danny's former wife from the first film (Julia Roberts), now back with him, is enlisted, hence the sequel's title. On the law enforcement side, the sequel also offers the savvy Europol agent (Catherine Zeta-Jones) who's the sometime love interest of Brad Pitt's Rusty Ryan.

Ocean's Twelve isn't the effortless lark its predecessor was. Clooney, who gave the ultimate movie-star performance of recent years in that film, has less to do here, while the elaborate plot bloats the running time up to 130 minutes (an hour after the movie was over, I realized much of the last hour's twists and turns were immaterial to the caper). Still, it's hard to argue with a comedy that supplies so many laughs and that, despite its overextended length, is nonetheless lighter on its feet than most thrillers. Clooney, Pitt (in the rare role in which he actually comes off smart), Elliott Gould and Matt Damon all give mischievous performances, with much nudge-nudge joking about post-Jason Bourne Damon's skittish character asking for an "increased role" in the Rome caper. Not surprisingly, he gets it. iB

Alexander ★★
Silly dialogue? Check. Phony accents up the wazoo? Check. An old British coot overacting? Check. Confusing battle scenes? Check. An overall stiffness that makes you wonder if a Viagra product placement is right around the corner? Check. In other words, this stodgy costume epic about the Greek conqueror (Colin Farrell) is full of things that usually plague such movies. Jeez, you'd expect something a little more unconventional from Oliver Stone. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Closer ★
The youth and early career of Red Sox reliever Keith Foulke come alive in this—aw, hell, it's just Mike Nichols' insufferably talky drama about the infidelities among a quartet of blah characters. The two male Brits (Jude Law, Clive Owen) and two American women (Julia Roberts, Natalie Portman) hook up, break up and make up so often that you never really take an interest in who ends up with whom. Then again, the characters are just pawns that writer Patrick Marber pushes around without putting much effort into turning them into fleshy, believable people. Poor Marber thinks because his characters talk about sex (and have it offscreen), they're "real." Only Owen, who steals scene after scene, makes his character interesting. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

End of the Century: The Story of the Ramones ★★★
After years in the works, Jim Fields and Michael Grimaglia's outstanding documentary on the prototypical punk band is finally here. The movie celebrates the fast, loud, darkly humorous three-chord rock of the Queens punks by charting their rise in its first half. Then it peers into the unhappy offstage relationships that made much of the band's 22 years miserable for its members. The feud between shy liberal Joey and hard-nosed conservative Johnny—sent to extremes when Joey's girlfriend left him for Johnny, whom she then married—is the source of the most discontent. Although the movie includes frank interviews from Johnny, the leader who took a "soldier on," all-business attitude to the band's commercial struggle, and from colorful Dee Dee, its main flaw is that it never broaches such emotional topics with Joey. But now that all three are dead, this is the best we'll ever get. (At the Brattle, Dec. 17 and 18.)

Finding Neverland ★★
As Peter Pan playwright J.M. Barrie, Johnny Depp nails a Scottish accent and gives his character a pent-up imagination that bursts loose when he meets a quartet of boys grieving for their late father. It's hard to imagine anyone else giving as rousing a performance as Depp does. Still, his movie never made me want to clap my hands in approving belief. This Edwardian fluff means to be a celebration of Barrie's tale of retaining your inner child, but when half of pop culture tells us that these days, is it really very special? Meanwhile, the film could have easily been called The Attack of the Art Department, and that's a big surprise from director Marc Forster, whose previous movies were the much rawer Everything Put Together and Monster's Ball. There's also a soap opera surrounding the boys' sickly mom (Kate Winslet), and the entire mix is rather cheesy and creepy. (At Boston Common.)

Hey! Is Dee Dee Home? ★★★
Director Lech Kowalski (D.O.A.) interviewed late punk icon/junkie Dee Dee Ramone for Born to Lose, his 1999 movie about late proto-punk icon/junkie Johnny Thunders (of New York Dolls and Heartbreakers fame). Now, he's taken an hour's worth of outtakes from his Dee Dee interview and cobbled them into this colorful, entertaining movie. Those who've seen the recent Ramones documentary, End of the Century (see above) know Dee Dee had many tales to tell and an undeniable charisma that made him an oddly lovable screw-up. (Midnights at the Coolidge Corner, Jan. 7 and 8.)

House of Flying Daggers ★★½
There's something oddly distasteful about Zhang Yimou's recent artsy forays into martial arts. His latest doesn't look so much like a perfume commercial as his Hero did, and some of the action sequences in this 9th-century tale are imaginative and well executed (though heavy on the digital effects). But if you like martial-arts movies with a gritty, rock 'n' roll energy, Zhang's two most recent films have the antiseptic, classical-music sterility (this one ends incredulously with opera diva Kathleen Battle bellowing a ludicrously over-the-top reprisal of a song from the tale). Storywise, this starts out with a Western-like economy, as an undercover lawman (Takeshi Kaneshiro) befriends a mysterious female martial artist (Zhang Ziyi) who may be a member of the anti-government gang that gives the movie its name. Early complications effectively thicken the drama, but there are eventually so many people pretending to be so many fake identities that the drama, which morphs into a love triangle, gets all balled up—culminating in an emotionally overblown final action sequence that just gets silly. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and suburbs.)

The Incredibles ★★★

The animation in Pixar's computer-generated movies keeps improving, and this is the first one that's had the nerve to put humans—albeit semi-abstract ones—in the foreground. That's not a problem at all, as the animation's ability to portray facial expressions is so much better than it was for past Pixar movies, in which human action was kept to a minimum (like the Toy Story series). Still, this is the first Pixar movie that's merely good, not great. Once again, there's an amazing mesh of voice actors and characters, with Craig T. Nelson and Holly Hunter playing retired husband-and-wife superheroes forced back into action along with their supergifted kids (Sarah Vowell and Spencer Fox). But the story is an awful lot like Spy Kids, with more emphasis put on the parents, and for much of the middle section, this is merely a decent animated "big" action movie, with less of a satiric twist than Team America. Pixar has raised the bar so high that, when taken against other animated movies, The Incredibles is still very creative. But it's also disappointing at times and overstretched. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Kinsey ★★★

Scientist Alfred Kinsey became obsessed with researching the sexual habits of Americans and having his scientific findings replace myth and traditional morality in shaping people's view of "average" sexual behavior. Bill (Gods and Monsters) Condon's period piece does a fascinating job of capturing the fervent work of Kinsey (Liam Neeson) and showing how his findings of the 1940s and 1950s shook up the public and put the powers-that-be on high alert. Neeson's performance recalls the fixation of his Oskar Schindler, with the goal this time of getting people's sex histories on paper, while Laura Linney, Peter Sarsgaard, John Lithgow and Oliver Platt fill out the deep cast. The intensity of this rise-and-fall story starts to peter out, though, when it gets to the third act, thanks to vagueness in chronology and the sense that many events are being rushed through and oversimplified, right down to the rather mystifyingly upbeat ending. (At Copley Place, Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and suburbs.)

National Treasure ★½

After Trey Parker and Matt Stone's dead-on parody of Jerry Bruckheimer's action monstrosities in Team America, I was ready to laugh my ass off at Bruckheimer's latest. But what a drag. The gimmicky founding-fathers-hid-a-treasure-and-Nicolas-Cage-is-gonna-find-it action-thriller from the producer of such obnoxious ordeals as Armageddon, Bad Boys and Pearl Harbor isn't even bad enough to be good. This gadget-heavy, character-light diversion is just mediocre and forgettable. From a sunken British ship lodged in the arctic ice to the Declaration of Independence to the Franklin Institute to Independence Hall to Wall Street, it's a long-winded jigsaw puzzle that is easy to stop caring about. More to the point, it's hard to start caring about it. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

On the Waterfront ★★★½
The gritty method drama is back for a 50th-anniversary rerelease, and there are plenty of reasons to like its drama of union corruption on the docks and one big reason not to like it. Among the many likable: the cast of downright strong and colorful performers, from Marlon Brando, Lee J. Cobb and Rod Steiger to Fred Gwynne, Martin Balsam and boxer "Two Ton" Tony Galento. Let's not forget Eva Marie Saint on the distaff side, too. The big reason not to like it? That director Elia Kazan may have made this story of testifying against lawbreakers to rationalize his own "naming names" during the 1950s congressional witch hunt for Communists. (At Kendall Square.)

Ray ★★★
Jamie Foxx's monumental performance dominates this fairly conventional biopic in which a talented hero (R&B/pop pioneer Ray Charles) overcomes adverse circumstances (witnessing his brother's drowning, going blind at age 7) and inner demons (a heroin habit, infidelity) to become a beloved American institution. Sometimes director Taylor Hackford's Hollywood treatment stretches credibility, particularly when the movie contrives to have Charles concoct the classic "What'd I Say?" as an impromptu time filler onstage one night. And the movie might be too forgiving of the pain Charles caused his wife. But Foxx is so immersed in the role, giving Charles a sly charisma, and the musical moments (with Foxx lip-synching to Charles' recordings) are so good that the movie's life-affirming intentions win out. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

House of Flying Daggers is the latest from Hero director Zhang Yimou

Sideways ★★★
Alexander Payne's Sideways does for the approach of middle age what his About Schmidt did for the onset of old age: uses it as a springboard for bittersweet comedy and a road trip. At first, this makes the latest from the director of Citizen Ruth and Election a letdown. But Payne and writing partner Jim Taylor's riffs on male bonding make this story of two 40-ish buddies' trip to California wine country painfully funny. It's hard to say where the characters leave of and the actors begin in the hilarious little moment in which the pair goes to wineries to sample the lat est vintages. Paul Giamatti (American Splendor), wh could be amusing reading a shopping list, gives a col orful tilt to wine connoisseur Miles' picky assess

Meanwhile, Thomas Haden Church's Jack has an endearing dumb-jock quality, and his response to Miles' "knowledgeable" wine talk is usually "tastes pretty good to me." Making a list of the year's best CDs and concert DVDs

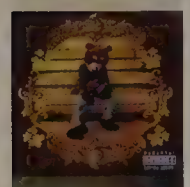
BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Once again, 'tis the season for year-end lists and last-minute holiday gifts. Here are my picks for CDs and concert DVDs. The CD list favors my critical choices of 2004, while my DVD recommendations sample a range of current entries.

CDs

U2, How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb (Interscope). Bono and the boys deliver grand, melodic statements that echo past glories while connecting with the heart of the present.

Angelique Kidjo, Oyaya! (Columbia). Afro-pop star Kidjo captures her onstage spark in the studio on this final piece of a trilogy that traces African roots in the New World. She tackles Caribbean styles with crisp authority.



Loretta Lynn, Van Lear Rose (Interscope). The grande dame of country mines authentic ground with blues-punk prodigy Jack White, bringing an airy grace and grit to her songs.

Green Day, American Idiot (Reprise). These West Coast punks have long nodded to the Who with their coiled combustion, but take it up a notch with this seamless, Bush-whacking rock opera.

Nick Cave & the Bad Seeds, Abattoir Blues/The Lyre of Orpheus (Anti). The prolific prince of post-Goth darkness branches to extremes on a double CD that balances gospel-blues outbursts and adventurous ballads. Combined, it's a peak work that's theatrical, tuneful and tongue-in-cheek.

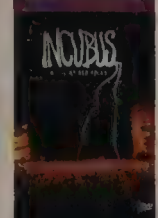
Kanye West, The College Dropout (Rock-A-Fella). Hot hip-hop producer lays rhymes with Jay-Z and company while mixing gospel and sped-up samples on his cocky, cynical, catchy debut.

Modest Mouse, Good News for People Who Love Bad News (Epic). Like the Flaming Lips (who assist on one track), Modest Mouse float from indie-rock cultdom to major-label breakthrough with a fractured, hypnotic blend, serving up orchestral minimalism, psychedelic funk and Talking Heads-style exhortations.

Grant Lee Phillips, Virginia Creeper (Zoe/Rounder). Mystery and melancholy steeped in Americana; the ex-leader of Grant Lee Buffalo finds his place again with charming songcraft.

Don Byron, Ivey-Divey (Blue Note). Inspired by the conceptual blueprint of a bassless 1946 Lester Young trio, jazz clarinetist Byron stretches out in brash new directions with pianist Jason Moran and drummer Jack DeJohnette.

Elvis Costello & the Imposters, The Delivery Man (Lost Highway). Costello hits a comfortable prime with rootsy rock, backup from Lucinda Williams and Emmylou Harris, and the brilliant touch of visualizing Elvis Presley in the title track.



Concert DVDs

David Byrne, Live at Union Chapel (WSM). Glorious colors bathe the contours of an English chapel behind the ex–Talking Head's striking 2002 blend of rock and acoustic strings.

Live Aid (WSM). A good cause (African famine relief) and bad haircuts rule intercontinental stadium concerts that feature most every pop star of 1985. Four discs of timeless highs (Queen, David Bowie) and dated lows (Spandau Ballet, Kenny "Footloose" Loggins), plus collaborative moments like Mick Jagger and Tina Turner trying to outstrut each other.

Eric Clapton, Crossroads Guitar Festival (Reprise). More killer matchups. Clapton faces off with Santana, Buddy Guy, Robert Randolph and others in a 2004 benefit for his drug treatment center. The diverse lineup also showcases Joe Walsh, John Mayer, Vince Gill, John McLaughlin and ZZ Top.

Norah Jones and the Handsome Band, Live in 2004 (Blue Note). The focus is on Jones' gorgeous voice in a setting that's more light country than jazz, with relaxed camera work and smart cameos by Dolly Parton and Gillian Welch.

Phish, IT (WSM). A surprise, free-form jam atop a control tower is among the musical and conceptual delights captured at the just-disbanded Vermont group's 2003 IT fest in Maine. There's an excess of self-inflating chat, but 10 uncut bonus songs are a plus (even if the choices aren't as epic as the bonus tracks on the new DVD release of The Grateful Dead Movie, a 1974 performance with a mellower tone).

Ani DiFranco, Trust (Righteous Babe). A folk-punk radical engages her troops in a stripped-down D.C. setting, filmed at creative, intimate angles by photographer Danny Clinch.

Aerosmith, You Gotta Move (CMV). The pacing is flashy, with too many busty fan sing-alongs, but Aerosmith wields a rock-solid punch both on its hits and raunchy blues covers.

Susan Tedeschi, Live from Austin TX (New West). Norwell's soulful blues-rock star gets her first DVD from the Austin City Limits vaults, part of a crop that also includes a mean 1986 show from lean country renegade Steve Earle.

Incubus, Alive at Red Rocks (EMV). Brandon Boyd apes Bono's emotive impact at the same natural amphitheater where U2 filmed a breakthrough concert video in 1983, as this California band takes flight with a rush of hard rock and hip-hop atmospheres heightened by rotating views.

Simon & Garfunkel, Old Friends: Live on Stage (Warner Reprise Video). Fans who missed the high-priced 2003 tour can settle into their living room for the duo's hit parade with guests the Everly Brothers (plus 1970 TV clips for contrast). More close-ups might have been cool, or not. IB

Your name/phone number/e-mail: _____

[Deadline: January 3, 2005]

WHAT MAKES A GREAT BARTENDER?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-card routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartender issue.

Thank You!

Thank God there are still good samaritans out there in the world. I just want to thank the person who found my stolen bag and actually turned it in to the police! You have saved me hours and hours of work to recover the stuff that was in there and I truly appreciate it! And to the scum who broke into my car and stole my money and my bag—YOU'RE AN ASSHOLE! I hope you couldn't find your dealer that night to get a quick fix! As a matter of fact, I hope you did get your quick fix and dropped dead soon after! Sincerely,

—A truly appreciative teacher

Fresh Air Beauty

It was a warm November night and I was tired and on my way home from a long day at work when I spotted you. You were in Fresh Hair on South Street in Jamaica Plain servicing a customer at the reception area. Your wonderful smile breathed new air into my tired spirit. I stopped and acted as if I was reading the sign in the window. I couldn't get your attention, and felt a bit intimidated by your beauty, so I kept on walking rather than go in and introduce myself. You had on a maroon or purple sweater with your brown hair up. It was the evening of November 18. I would very much like to meet you! If you are interested, please respond.

Hot Lowell Train Conductor

Sometimes you're on my 6:50 am Lowell train when Jay the normal conductor is out. You're the conductor who looks and acts like a Marine—maybe you are a Marine. I just wanted to let you know that when you're my conductor, you make me smile and that smile lasts all day. I'll be standing at the North Billerica station and see your face go by and know that it's going to be a good day. There's something about your confidence that drives me wild. I look forward to the next time you're my conductor and take me to work. I just wish that you were my "conductor" every day.

Redheaded Georgetown Hoya

I think it was late November 17. I walked up to the Green Line at Park Street with my beagle, Madison, and noticed you—a smartly dressed redhead. You made your way over to pet Maddy and we started chatting—about your recent move to Boston, Central Asia, the dog you miss at home and your alma mater. When the train came, you got on and I didn't. Why? Mostly because I'm an idiot but also because it was the wrong one. I meant to ask for your number and offer to show you around. Instead, I said nothing and had to explain to Maddy why her new friend wouldn't be coming to dinner. So e-mail me if you're interested in having dinner, taking a Duck Tour or getting your dog fix.

Quite Foolish

With all the opportunities I'm presented with, it defies logic why I still say nothing. The unfortunate matter being that I have no common ground on which to speak to you, since I neither have classes with you nor live on campus, and 80 Boylston is a little out of the way. Tonight, especially, I had a prime opportunity, having boarded the E train at Symphony on my way back to 80 Boylston and found myself standing directly next to you. Alas, I was too shy to even turn my head. But you, blonde in a green coat, you'll remember me: red hair, small black shoulder bag with a metal plate, black everything else and my ubiquitous silver headphones. And the way I move my hands to music is probably memorable as well. I'm wondering how often you change the flowers in your room, and whether I'll ever have the courage to actually approach you. It's just an invitation. Since I'm far too shy.

To the Brown-Haired Cutie at Lir

We were both upstairs at Lir on a recent Saturday. You were at a friend's high school reunion party. You were talking to your friend, and I was waiting for an opportunity to talk to you. When your friend started dancing—rather enthusiastically—you smiled at me and I came over and pretended to have known you from high school (hey, it worked in Groundhog Day, didn't it?). I soon fessed up to the truth and we had a laugh. But before we could talk some more, some guy came along and whisked you away—against your wishes?—to dance. If you'd like to continue the conversation, I'd love to hear from you.

To All the Job Interviewers out There

In the years since graduating college, I've been on my fair share of job interviews. But I've been noticing a disturbing trend in business etiquette: the lack of any kind of communication following an interview. I always take the time to hand write a thank you note as a follow-up to each and every person with whom I interview. However, that courtesy goes both ways—or at least it should. How many times have I heard "We'll be in touch..." only to have letters, e-mails and phone calls inquiring about the position blatantly ignored. This is highly unprofessional and disrespectful. Call me old-fashioned, but a simple acknowledgment (e-mail reply, returned phone call, even a form letter!) that I took time out of my day to speak with you should go without saying. Ignoring all but the one candidate you make an offer to says a lot about you and your company. If that's the way you treat people, then I'm glad I don't have to work for you. Think back to when you were interviewing for that job you have now—remember what it was like? And remember this: Nothing in life is for certain. You may find yourself on the other side of that interview one day.

—Interviewee

For the Six Businessmen Loudly Discussing Gay Marriage at Oleana

During our dinner at Oleana on December 1, after listening to your lengthy trope-filled discussion—in which Mr. Yellow Shirt managed to invoke animals and sex with cousins and a host of other clichés—perhaps my partner and I (the gay couple sitting next to you) should have introduced ourselves, since you clearly don't know what or who you're talking about. We're a monogamous same-sex couple who had a wedding ceremony 10 years ago and who will be marking that decade of commitment with a legal wedding in a few weeks. We're also educators who have, between us, worked with disabled children, developmentally delayed kids, at-risk youth, and many others. I hope whatever business you're in is doing as much good for the world as we have tried to do; and I hope your marriages have been as faithful and enduring. And what I really hope that is you don't ever poison anyone else's evening with your ignorance.

—The Couple Sitting Next to You

Train Wreck

Tina: On November 18 on the 1:29 pm train out of North Beverly, you took my $10 and took my breath away. I gave you a Milwaukee business card with my permanent Mass. phone on the back. Outside the train at Boston, I remarked how "pleasant" you were and stammered silently away. If you're not married, engaged (didn't notice rings or tan lines) or bitterly divorced, give a call. If you lost the card, respond in the next IMPROPER. If there's no response, I lost.

rockie horoscope

SAGITTARIUS NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

As the year draws to a close, everything that matters is finally all about you—at least, in your own mind. The Sag new moon on the 11th inaugurated a month-long learning period focusing on the changes in your personal life that need to be made. If you didn't suspect what they were, you should by the time the sun joins Pluto the week of the 13th. Despite the "hail fellow, well met" sociability Venus brings to the scene when she enters your sign on the 16th, tending to basic life-and-death Plutonic business—rescue and repair—takes precedence.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

While your Saturn ruler is rewarded by amiable, affectionate Venus this week, you could find yourself in an especially good mood enjoying especially good company. Not only might your partner embrace business acquaintances and colleagues at work, the core "group" might not resent the time you spend away from them. Mutual support is rare, genuine reciprocity rarer still. Enjoy the hugs and kisses while they last, because a week later those friendships can cost more than you expected to pay. This is a better time for a business than for an intimate relationship.

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

Matters concerning work and health, along with donations of time and money, are particularly important as the year ends. Even if your contributions to worthy causes remain anonymous, somehow your reputation as a benefactor will spread. How far and how wide depends on the good graces or word of mouth of your colleagues. Someone on the inside, like your accountant, knows what's up. Anticipate an exciting surprise in time for the winter solstice as magnetic Venus attracts your Uranus ruler. Are you prepared for a public display of affection? Thought not.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

The Sagittarius new moon can initiate a more accepting approach to family matters and a more philosophical way of dealing with your boss. This is the time to let go of whatever it is you can't control. Mid-March Fish may find it easier to relax once they realize that rock-steady Saturn is acting as an anchor and that their emotions won't ricochet from one extreme to the other this holiday season. February Fish, however, may be thrown for a loop when vivacious Venus challenges unpredictable Uranus in the early degrees of your sign.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

You haven't been sitting this pretty for a while. With generous Jupiter in your Libra house of partners and the passionate pairing of Venus and your Mars ruler in your Scorpio house of sex and other people's money, this promises to be the best holiday season in a long time. Add the high spirits and high aspirations that began with the Sagittarius new moon cycle, plus a reward due to materialize around the solstice—for being so patient and thorough?—and you're set. So sit back, relax and rake in the goodies.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

When your Venus ruler is receiving Saturn's gift of prudence and productivity, it's a good time to concentrate on acquiring assets that you trust will increase in value—and that time is now! Act quickly before Venus leaves security-conscious Scorpio for freedom-loving Sagittarius on the 16th. Moments of madcap unpredictability around the solstice can result in odd choices. That's also when your erotic pulse might beat fast and furiously, when impulsive Uranus shows Venus the pleasures and pains of opting for whatever is new and different.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

Although the sun merges with your Mercury ruler six times a year, the thoughts you channel this week when they conjunct in visionary Sagittarius can have long-range repercussions. Don't be surprised if you get a glimpse of the future and the role you're destined to play in it. Mercury turns direct the night of the 19th, but it'll be another three weeks before it advances into new territory. Take time to enjoy all that you managed to accomplish during this heavy-duty retrograde session. Maybe go someplace special with someone special?

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Another cycle of your work history began with the opportunistic Sagittarius new moon on the 11th. And while it may seem pointless to focus on your next gig in the midst of holiday celebrations, there's no denying cosmic timing. Even more incongruous is the fact that the Cancer full moon, often the most personal and emotional lunation of the year for a Moon Child, falls on the 26th. Imagine what your state of mind might be by then! Just remind everyone that Boxing Day refers to boxes of recycled Christmas presents, not left jabs and right hooks.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

One way to direct the surge of pure energy and willpower emanating your sun ruler's annual meeting with Pluto is to try to resurrect a romantic relationship or transform a friendship into something else. Another is to take up an extreme sport and experience how close to dying you can come and still survive. Testing your powers of regeneration is par for this course of action, but while parties are so plentiful, an abundance of good cheer may be harmful. Take it easy with the seasonal libations and the drugs too.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

The Sagittarius new moon kicks off a month of family involvement (some call it interference) and historical recollection. Dredging up dirt that was long forgotten or intentionally kept secret can spark renewed (some call it obsessive) interest. Your Mercury ruler comes out of retrograde on the 19th; until that happens, you shouldn't assume that the information you're uncovering is the gospel truth. Review, rewrite or retell the story until you're satisfied with the revised version, the one that exonerates everyone concerned.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Greater prestige and profits too. Those periods when you were patient instead of pissed off finally pay off. While your Venus ruler is supported by steady-as-she-goes Saturn, sticking to family values, no matter how you choose to define them, can also heighten your sense of self-worth. Reward yourself; buy something big or suitably impressive that'll last a long time. But do it before the 19th, before Venus falls for the charms of idiosyncratic Uranus and inadvertently upsets whatever apple cart has been feeding you and yours.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Whether you're accumulating a ton of presents or a pile of money, while the Sagittarius sun merges with your Pluto co-ruler, you're free—if you so choose—to show the rest of us how wise and powerful you really are. Controlling the purse strings or insisting that your value system carries more weight can be equally potent ways to make your point. But once Christmas arrives and your Mars co-ruler leaves Scorpio for a six-week romp through Sag, you may become less invested in maintaining such a strong image. That's when the winter fun begins.

The Black Rose 160 State St., Boston, 617-742-2286. Boston's legendary Irish Pub celebrates its 25th year! Considered one of the best Irish pubs in America, the menu features American and Irish specialties. Live Irish music nightly.

Hennessy's of Boston 25 Union St., Boston,617-742-2121. Boston's most authentic Irish pub next to Faneuil Hall serves a great menu with daily specials and Irish traditions. A huge bar with an extensive beer and wine list, Hennessy's has Boston's best appetizer menu. Enjoy live entertainment five nights a week with pop bands direct from Ireland. Hennessy's of Boston, "Purveyor's of Fine Food and Spirits," are part of the Somers' Pubs Fleet.

Green Briar 304 Washington St., Brighton 617-789-4100. A little taste of Ireland with great tasting, affordable food. One of the most popular nightspots in town, the Green Briar has become the area's headquarters for international sports viewing and live entertainment. Live music five nights a week, featuring local bands on weekends, a traditional Irish Seissun every Monday night and Prime Time Trivia every Tuesday. The hospitable atmosphere makes the Green Briar an excellent place to hold luncheons, wedding rehearsals, social gatherings and small business meetings. Open 11 am - 1am 7 days a week. Cover charge varies on Friday and Saturday nights and some sporting events on Sundays.

The Green Dragon 11Marshall St., Boston, 617-367-0055. Hailed "Headquarters of the Revolution," this favorite after work meeting place is famous for it's "giant cocktail drink special menu." A comfortable place serving lunch and dinner and highly acclaimed Irish breakfast every Sat. & Sun. from 11 am to 3pm. The tavern boasts over 15 beers on tap, 20 different bottled "brewskies" and imported Irish brews. Live music and entertainment every Thursday through Sunday night.

Kinvara 34 Harvard Ave., Allston 617-783-9400. At the Kinvara, the crowd is spirited, the staff is hospitable, the food is great and everyone is treated as a "regular". It's the local gathering place with authentic Irish pub flavor. Live international sports viewing via satellite includes soccer, rugby and hurling. Live bands entertain to a lively crowd on weekends. The mainstream pub fare menu ranges from grilled sandwiches and fish & chips to traditional Irish dishes and innovative daily specials. At the Kinvara, you'll enjoy a true Irish pub experience. Open 11 am - 2am 7 days a week.

Mr. Dooley's Boston Tavern 77 Broad St., Boston, 617-338-5656. Hailed by the Globe as "the gem of the Financial District," Mr. Dooley's is a favorite meeting place for young professionals. The authentic Irish pub with over 13 imported beers on tap has been voted "Boston's Best Burgers" and "Best Cheap Eats." Open daily until 2am, featuring live bands every Fri. through Sun. night. "A great place for a pint and a chat."

PRESENT TENSE

A quick primer to help you make sure your gifts don't send the wrong message

It's holiday time again, which means it's time to buy lots of presents whether you like it or not. People may say that regardless of what you give, it's the thought that counts, but that's not true. If, for instance, you give someone a Mercedes SL 65 AMG, it's not really the thought but the $179,720 you spent that counts. However, for lesser gifts, you really need to consider what message you're sending, lest the best of intentions be taken the wrong way, and your holiday be spent making apologies instead of gingerbread cookies and sweet love. Luckily for you, I've selected some of the top presents for this year and considered all of the implications of giving them, so that you can concentrate on other things, like how to break the news to Jim Bob that he's been in jail a month longer than you've been pregnant.

GILLETTE MACH 3 POWER

The Mach 3 Power is Gillette's answer to the Schick Quattro. You know there must've been some red faces around Gillette when Schick trumped the three-blade Mach 3 with the four-blade Quattro, which looks like a cheese grater on a stick. But instead of debasing themselves by rolling out the Mach 4, which would've been tantamount to an admission that four blades are superior to three, Gillette sent shaving science hurtling in a totally new direction: the electric nonelectric razor. The Mach 3 Power is essentially your stock Mach 3 Turbo with a battery-powered motor in the handle that makes the whole shebang vibrate. It sounds incredibly stupid, but I'm here to say it works. The first time I shaved with that sucker, it felt like rubbing a baby's bottom across my face—a baby's bottom that magically erased my stubble. Like maybe a baby with Nair on its bottom. The Mach 3 Power is awesome.

Don't ever buy anyone a razor for a present, though. Buying someone a razor says "Hey, I think you're really hairy." Let people figure that out for themselves, when passersby pat them on the head and say, "Who's a good boy? You're a good boy!"

THE FORD MUSTANG

In a recent episode of Sunday-night-girl-show-that-I-watch American Dreams, J.J. was given a Mustang on his return home from Vietnam. This was followed by the creepiest Ford ad I've ever seen, which was about five minutes long and featured a father giving his semi-estranged son a new Mustang on his return home from Iraq—making the point that the foreign quagmire may change, but the muscle car stays the same. (The father didn't meet the son at the airport because he was busy getting groceries, which struck me as pretty bizarre. If your son were coming home from a war, do you think you'd choose the moment of his return to say, "Hey, are we running low on cottage cheese? I'd better run to the store."?)

During the next hour of Must-See TV, another teenager was given a Mustang on Desperate Housewives, although this one probably didn't have a product-placement tie-in since (A) It was a previous-generation Mustang, not the new one they're hawking now; and (B) the kid in question ran over an old lady later in the show. Not exactly the feel-good sentimentality that Ford paid good money for in the previous show.

So, according to two popular TV shows, giving someone a Ford Mustang could either be a way to build a contrived, sappy bridge between generations or to buy the affection of a spoiled alcoholic teenager who will use it to run down nosy old ladies who are trying to bust their daughter-in-law for sleeping with the gardener. In either case, don't buy the V-6 model unless the giftee works at a hair salon in Revere.

PLAXO SOFTWARE

Here's a gift you can give to everyone you know: Sign up for Plaxo, which is some kind of personal organizer software. Then absolutely everyone can get annoying e-mails from you saying "Hi, I don't have your updated contact information. Please take a moment to fill out this form." Then your friends will say, "Gee, apparently you do have my contact information because you just sent me that e-mail. Why do you need my pager number? I'm your roommate; you know where to find me. This is stupid and I don't think I want to be friends with you anymore." So go get Plaxo now, particularly if you have too many friends and need to cut back your social schedule.

A POUND OF HAM

If you know someone who goes to the deli and regularly buys cold cuts in quarter-pound increments, please do them a favor and give them a pound of ham. This gift will show them that a whole pound of ham isn't really that unmanageable, and in fact is just about right. A few sandwiches, maybe some ham and eggs on the weekend, and voila, you've used up your pound of ham and it's time to get another. This is also a gift to me, because if people ahead of me in the deli line continue to order quarter-pounds of cold cuts, thus monopolizing the deli guy and assuring they'll be back the next day to make the line too long again, eventually I'm going to commit a felony assault involving a large chunk of Muenster and a container of marinated mushrooms. Repeat after me: When I go to the deli, I'm going to order at least a pound of meat and a half-pound of cheese.

IF YOU KNOW SOMEONE WHO BUYS COLD CUTS IN QUARTER-POUND INCREMENTS, PLEASE DO THEM A FAVOR AND GIVE THEM A POUND OF HAM.

AN IPOD

As you must know, an iPod is the gift this year. Giving someone an iPod tells them that you want to make their lives simpler, because iPods make listening to music so easy. Instead of the old way—putting a CD in a CD player and hitting "play"—all you have to do is get a computer, load your CD into your computer, download the iTunes software if you don't have it, then record the CD onto your computer's hard drive in your iTunes music library, then load the iPod software onto your computer, then plug the iPod into your computer via FireWire or USB cable, then load the songs onto the iPod, drag the iPod icon into the trash, disconnect it from your computer, click "Music" on the main menu, then "Album," then the CD you just recorded, then hit "play." Or you can download music from the iTunes store, assuming the song you want is in the iTunes music store, you've downloaded iTunes version 4.7...

AN OLD NAVY FLEECE

A POWERBALL TICKET

This gift says, "If this actually wins, I'm going to have to kill myself."

COLOGNE/PERFUME

"I don't like the way you smell."

CASH

GIFT CERTIFICATES

"I hope you wanted $25 worth of something at Kohl's."

WOMEN'S CLOTHING, FROM A MAN

"If this isn't exactly the right size, style, material, color and brand, I'm a dead man."

MEN'S CLOTHING, FROM A WOMAN

"Here's something you're going to have to wear at least once every two weeks or things are going to get mighty uncomfortable around here."

And there you have it. I know this is only the outer leaf of the iceberg lettuce, but please remember that this time of year isn't supposed to be about crass consumerism anyway. It's about spending time with loved ones, so go home and do that right now. There are only so many copies of Gran Turismo 4 at Best Buy, and if I don't get one my Christmas is ruined. iB

DEAR JONATHAN

Soroff

Your regularly scheduled Last Scene Here will soon return, as IMPROPER staffer Jonathan Soroff is currently recuperating from heart surgery, an endeavor that unfortunately vastly restricts one's ability to schmooze. However, Jonathan is bouncing back in record time, and we're looking forward to his triumphant return, as are his roughly 1.3 million friends around the city. To everyone who's sent in kind wishes on his behalf, Jonathan extends his thanks. As ever, he can be reached at jonathan@improper.com.
